In an article headed "Cost of White House Grows," in THE NEW YORK TIMES of March 14, the inference was given that the White House needs a new roof because its present copper covering is worn out. The fact is, however, the present roof is of several materials. It is not the condition of the surface material alone which requires repairs upon the White House roof but also the condition of the supporting timbers.

PHONE PIONEER STILL INVENTING

Emile Berliner Completed Bell's Device by Adding a Transmitter and Produced Gramophone Disk Record

By FREDERIC WILLIAM WILE.

AMERICA and the world this year are celebrating the golden jubilee of the telephone, invented by Alexander Graham Bell in 1876. To the glory of that achievement an American scientist still alive richly shares. He is Emile Berliner of Washington, D. C., inventor of the microphone (or transmitter) and later of disk records for the gramophone.

Mr. Berliner will be 75 years old on May 20. He is still inventing. Within the last year he has devised "acoustic tiles," which are destined, he believes, to revolutionize interior architecture. He remains restlessly active and persistently creative. He indulges in but one relaxation—crusading for child hygiene. To that humanitarian hobby all his spare time nowadays is devoted, as it has been for nearly a quarter of a century.

"Whatever the telephone and talking machine may have been before Emile Berliner's time, it cannot be successfully disputed that he converted them into the instruments they are today."

Thus wrote Waldemar Kaempffert, at one time editor of The Scientific American, in response to a request for an opinion of Emile Berliner's rightful place in the chronicle of inventions. That niche has never been adequately assigned him. Men and women the world over exclusively associate the name of Alexander Graham Bell with the telephone. In almost as many minds it is only Thomas Alva Edison who made the talking machine the household convenience it has become.

The historical fact is that while Bell invented the telephone Berliner completed it. And the fact is that while various hands, including Edison's, combined to devise the talking machine, it was Berliner's genius that produced the "lateral cut" disk record and—perhaps most important of all—invented the process that enables unlimited numbers of duplicate records to be made from the original performance.

His Transmitter Invention.

Berliner's achievement in perfecting the telephone consisted of the invention of the loose contact transmitter, or microphone, as it is technically known. Alexander Graham Bell's patent for the telephone—"probably the greatest single patent every issued"—bears date of March 10, 1876. A little more than a year later—on April 14, 1877—Berliner filed with the United States Patent Office a caveat for his transmitter. Although he had lived in America barely seven years and his acquaintance with the English language was far from complete, the young inventor drew up a caveat subsequently pronounced by James J. Storrow of Boston, an eminent patent lawyer of his time, as "a classical document." It was a model of terse expression and technical exactitude. The transmitter was the addition indispensable to the conversion of the Bell telephone into a practical and functioning instrument. Upon that contribution to telephony the Bell system thenceforward proceeded to build up its mightly structure.

Fourteen years later—in 1895—the United States Supreme Court, as the final act in the historic drama of telephone litigation, decreed Emile Berliner to be the indisputable inventor of the transmitter. In point of duration and complexity the telephone litigation is the record of not less than 600 lawsuits. Since the affirmation of Emile Berliner's claim to the invention of the transmitter the Bell system has controlled telephony.

Berliner's career is all the more unusual in that he scaled the heights of scientific achievement without technical preparation or equipment. Born in Hanover in 1851, fifteen years before that placid little kingdom in Western Germany was subjugated by the Prussian conquerer, young Berliner was sent away to a school where he received an ordinary education in the elementary branches. In 1870, yielding to the lure of "free America," like so many ardent European spirits of his day, Berliner emigrated to the United States. He took with him little besides good breeding, an artistic temperament, an adventurous nature and an indomitable will to accomplish whatever he set out to do.

First Served as a Clerk.

Family friends already settled here found the 19-year-old immigrant a clerk's job in a small Washington dry goods store. There, and later as an apprentice in the New York Laboratory of Fahlberg, discoverer of saccharin, Berliner eked out a drab existence. It was devoted for the most part to self-Americanization—the young Hanoverian's chief ambition during those formative years. Berliner's first six years in the United States were bread-and-butter years, English-learning years. He had a smoldering ambition to become a scientist, but nothing that he could actually identify as a bent in that direction, and he was distressingly conscious of his lack of educational background for such a career.

In 1876 America and the world at large were electrified by the exhibition of Alexander Graham Bell's telephone at the Centennial in Philadelphia. Young Berliner's imagination was fired by the miracle of "talk by wire," and whenever off duty as a dry goods clerk in Washington he put in his time tinkering with a nondescript array of batteries, wire and other electrical paraphernalia rigged up in his lodgings, around the corner from the store where he was employed.

Berliner had not seen the Bell membrane telephone at the Centennial, and began toying with speech-transmission much as one plays blind man's buff. He thought that the proper way to transmit speech was by means of battery current. That fundamental seemed clear to him. Bell had made his invention with the magnetic current, but Berliner thought it might be possible to do it differently; so, before the Bell process was understood, except by a limited number of scientists, Berliner set out on unexplored paths of his own. Spare time during the working day and all of his evening time found him thinking and plodding, wondering and studying, his interest in the electric mysteries growing with every unrequited experiment.

Working Out His Idea.

Presently it occurred to Berliner that he could take a diaphragm and a contact-pin, or screw, touching it in the centre, and somehow produce an undulatory, wave-like electric current by continuous action of the contact, that is to say, not by interrupting it but by some form of perpetuity.

"I did not catch on to the pressure principle right away," he explains, "but I thought that if I took a flat spring and attached that to a screw, I could adjust the spring against the diaphragm—the current, of course, passing across the contact—so that if I spoke against it, each vibration would bring a little broader surface of the spring against the diaphragm and thereby produce electric sound waves in the current."

That was Berliner's first crude idea. He gave it form and substance by patching up a flimsy sort of telephone, which consisted of a membrane and a piece of spring in front. But he found he could not transmit speech. No discernible action ensued. Berliner now realized, probably for the first time, that his technical knowledge was unequal to the development of a conception that was inherently and scientifically sound. Then chance guided his steps in a fruitful direction.

Berliner struck up an acquaintance with a Mr. Richards, chief operator at the Washington fire alarm telegraph office, which he visited occasionally. There, one day, Berliner stumbled into an electrical kink which showed him like a flash that his crude telephone experiments were headed in the right direction. He observed that a different kind of "contact" was established through light or hard pressing of an ordinary telegraph key. Richards made him understand that more current passed over the "contact" when the sending key was pressed down hard.

Principle Confirmed.

"I went home in a highly expectant mood," he has since recounted, in telling of what proved to be the turning point of his telephonic experiments. "I knew I had it. Forthwith I rigged up a diaphragm, made a contact with a steel button, and polished it up brightly to insure a clean contact. Then I began to adjust it until the galvanometer showed the current. Then I pressed ever so gently. I found that each time I pressed against it the galvanometer deflected a larger angle. Then I knew the principle was right."

Berliner's experiments continued intensively thenceforward. Decisive results came to him through the humble medium of the membrane of a toy drum with a common sewing-needle firmly adjusted through it, a steel dress-button and a guitar string. That was the genesis of the telephone transmitter.

Berliner had heard of Bell's improved telephone with the iron diaphragm. He obtained Bell's second patent of Jan. 30, 1877, studied it, looked at Bell's model, and then made an iron diaphragm telephone. He knocked the bottom out of a small wooden soapbox, nailed on in place of it a piece of sheet iron for a diaphragm and placed a cross-bar in the middle of the box. A common screw, passing through this cross-bar, touched the centre of the diaphragm. In fact, Berliner soldered a polished steel button to the end of the screw so that the button was the actual contact piece which touched the diaphragm.

This was a great improvement. He tried it with a galvano-meter and found that the current varied regularly with the variation of pressure. With this he got speech. The instruments were not perfect, certainly. But they talked. The speaking microphone had been invented.

In National Museum.

Berliner's soap box, seven by twelve inches in size, today occupies an honored place in the National Museum at Washington along with other relics of his pioneering days in telephony and in gramophone invention.

Early in 1878 the Bell Telephone Company, now under the leadership of Theodore N. Vail, interested itself in Berliner's inventions and by the Fall of that year effected an arrangement with him whereby he transferred to the Bell group his rights pending before the Patent Office and entered their employ as a technical adviser.

The shrewd quartet of men now engaged in organizing telephony on business lines—Bell himself, Watson, Hubbard and Vail—realized speedily that a flawless transmitter was essential to the development of the telephone from both a scientific and financial standpoint. Rival interests, chiefly the Western Union Telegraph Company, were in the field and with their immensely greater capital and experience threatened to extinguish the Bell organization. But the latter stood its ground, having boundless confidence, above all, in the superiority of the Berliner transmitter. This, plus the contin[illegible]as current transformer, which Berliner had also invented, eventually became the mechanical basis on which the Bell System was built up.

Inspector of Transmitters.

For three years Berliner was at work in the Williams telephone factory at Boston, where Bell apparatus was manufactured. During 1879, the first 20,000 transmitters turned out there were put into service in various parts of the country after passing muster at the hands of Berliner, who now functioned as the Bell Company's chief instrument inspector. The transmitters were known as "Blake-Berliner transmitters." Francis Blake had given a happy mechanical form to Berliner's transmitter.

In 1881 the Bell Company granted Berliner a leave of absence to enable him to visit his widowed mother and brother and sisters in Germany. It was on the occasion of that visit that he established the first telephone factory in Germany under the supervision of his brothers, who eventually became rich men through the manufacture and sale of the Berliner transmitter throughout Europe. At that time there were practically no telephones in the empire except a few installations in use at the Imperial Post Office Department in Berlin.

Emile Berliner's scientific achievements have been recognized by the Franklin Institute of Philadelphia, which conferred upon him its gold medals for his contributions in the fields of both the telephone and the gramophone. The word "gramophone" is of Berliner's own invention. It has been said of his invention of the "lateral cut" method of making disk records that he contrived thereby to "etch the human voice." Since then music has been brought into millions of homes around the earth.

Early in the present century, with his work on the telephone and the gramophone completed, and both of those industries launched upon careers that have made many men millionaires, Emile Berliner turned his attention to humanitarian work.

He Led Pasteurization Fight.

It was mainly through his efforts that there was held in Washington in 1907, under Federal auspices, the conference which led to the general Pasteurization of milk through the adoption of Government standards.

Emile Berliner is an enthusiastic believer in the possibilities of youth, especially in "the invigorating atmosphere of America. Himself a brilliant product of the melting pot, he is a symbol of its possibilities. Incorrigibly optimistic, and at 75 as buoyant in step and spirit as a man twenty-five years his junior, Berliner thinks the invention which he has just announced—acoustic tiles—may be the greatest of his accomplishments. It has passed the experimental stage and is a demonstrated thing. By means of it, hearing in churches, theatres, assembly halls and auditoriums will, it is said, be so much improved that sound uttered in conversational tones will be audible hundreds of feet away. It is the latest, but probably not the last, flash of genius that will emanate from Emile Berliner, for he contends that there are still too many fields to conquer to justify a youngster in retiring at the age of 75.

RURAL SCOUTING IS TO BE DEVELOPED ALONG NEW LINES

Lone Scout Division Promotes Merit Badge Work Among Scattered Rural Boys

HEADQUARTERS of the Lone Scouts Division—devoted to the interest of the rural boy—have recently been moved from Chicago to the national office in New York. The division, formerly known as the Lone Scouts of America, with a membership of 45,000, became part of the Boy Scouts of America in March, 1924. The membership has now reached 97,000.

Many authorities on agricultural subjects are interested in the Lone Scout program. A special Advisory Committee composed of a number of them is cooperating with the Boy Scouts of America in developing extension plans for farm areas in rural scouting. O. H. Benson, formerly of the United States Department of Agriculture, has been appointed director of the Lone Scout Division and specialist in rural scouting.

Mr. Benson was reared on an Iowa farm. As a young man he taught in country schools and later was village Principal, high school teacher and County Superintendent of Schools. He organized fifty-two mid-West Chautauquas and was a prominent Chautauqua lecturer for years. At the request of the Department of Agriculture he undertook to interest rural boys and girls in homecraft and farm work. He originated and organized on a nation-wide basis the now famous 4-H Club work, or junior extension work. During the war the membership reached two and one-half million boys and girls, devoted to food production and conservation.

Fifty-six per cent. of the boys of Scout age in the United States live in small towns and farm areas. Although there are 6,200 troops with more than 120,000 Scouts in this territory, distances between homes and possible meeting places are so great that troop gatherings are impracticable. Lone Scouting steps in here. Such merit badge subjects as agriculture, beekeeping, poultry raising, dairying and gardening are of particular interest. Mr. Benson has proposed for the 1926 slogan, "Every Lone Scout to Show and Demonstrate at Least One Thing at a Fair or Exposition."

More than a score of publications are licensed and edited by these Scouts, who by mail and the printed word keep in touch with the progress of their brother Scouts.

The influence of the training has an example in the case of Lone Scout Ralph Carmichael of Brownsville, Fla. Carmichael joined Lone Scouting in April, 1917, and has been active ever since. He has won recognition in Lone Scout degrees as Booster and Lone Scout Scribe, has contributed short-story articles to The Lone Scout News and in 1919 published The Indian Magazine. He is a member of the tribe known as Indian Booster League, charter member of Frank D. Napier's Omegamma Fraternity, founder and head chief of the Blackfoot Confederacy, is advisory editor of Boys' Magazine and active also in the Square Fellows' Republic, a division of Lone Scouting created and developed by Herbert Hungerford. He is now editor, with a record of fifteen issues, of a forty-four page publication called Pita. He won the bronze medal for putting six issues out on time at the beginning and is now working for the gold medal and the quill badge for journalism. This will entitle him to the degree of Supreme Lone Scout.

Scout Saves Grandmother.

As Mrs. Julia Baber of Alameda, Cal., preparing dinner, stooped down to place a roast in the oven of the gas range there was an explosion and the flames ignited her blouse. In an adjoining room was her grandson, Harold, 13 years old, a member of Troop 20. Hearing his grandmother scream, he ran into the kitchen. One glance was enough. The youth seized a towel which he had been using to dry his face and hands and threw it quickly over his grandmother's head. This extinguished the flames and savel her from serious burns.

HISTORY REPEATS IN CONGRESS HALL

Senate and House of a Century Ago Debated Questions Much Like Those That Concern the Legislators of Today

IN April of 1826, a century ago, the lower house of Congress was busy with a League of Nations measure, amendments to the Constitution, the sins of a Circuit Judge, threatened trouble with Mexico and the rights of Congress and the Executive in foreign relations.

The Government of Colombia had called a conference of South and Central American countries for peace and mutual defense and invited us to send a representative. Mr. McLane of Delaware opposed participation in a written speech that must have lasted four hours. He quoted Washington's warning against entangling alliances, insisted that the invitation was an attempt to lead this country into a trap, and contended that we should have nothing to do with affairs of other nations beyond the Monroe Doctrine.

In debate it developed that Spain and Portugal had proposed an alliance with us and the other Governments on this hemisphere against Europe, and that the proposal had been rejected. Mr. Jefferson's followers, controlling the House, offered resolutions demanding of President John Quincy Adams copies of the address of our Minister to Spain on his arrival there. Mr. Webster opposed this in an unreported speech and succeeded in defeating it, 75 to 57. Mr. Livingstone of New York, favoring the resolution, spoke of the "gag rule" of the Administration.

Old-Time Measures.

Proposed amendments of the Constitution were to elect the President by direct vote of the people; to refer undetermined presidential elections to the State legislatures, to select from the three names receiving the highest votes, and to limit a President to two terms. The accused judge was in Alabama. The charges against him related to the seizure in Florida of a cargo of slaves from a Spanish vessel, the seventy-nine slaves having been sold unlawfully in Mississippi. The judge, however, had resigned.

By coincidence, in the week beginning April 3, 1826, a claim of Massachusetts against the Government for $1,000,000 was debated in the House, and in the same body a claim of the same State for $223,000 was debated, briefly, in the week ending April 2, 1926. The million-dollar claim was for troops used in the war of 1812, the other was for money spent by order of President Lincoln in the Civil War, with interest added.

In the 1826 debate a Pennsylvanian taunted Massachusetts with disloyalty and threatening secession, and an Ohio representative retorted that Pennsylvania should not talk, as she had refused to allow her troops beyond her own borders in 1812-14.

The Senate voted for the two-terms limitation April 3, 1826, although Mr. Randolph of Virginia spoke against it three hours. In that body a proposed duty on salt was much discussed. Resolutions requiring the Finance Committee to report a bill fixing a duty were defeated, 28 to 14, and the committee was instructed to make itself a fact-finding commission and report. Senate membership was 38 "Republicans," Jefferson men, to 10 Federalists, and this division was on party lines.

The Senate voted $50,000 to remove from the Savannah River hulks sunk there by the British in the Revolutionary War. Sale of lead from Government land in Missouri was authorized, the nearest armory being 1,000 miles away.

Court Dockets Crowded.

Prolonged debate arose over readjustment of circuits of the Federal courts to care for six new States. All court dockets were reported congested. Mr. Van Buren of New York, disclaiming attack on the Supreme Court, contended that its permanent location at Washington would be a disguised, deadly blow at the rights and liberties of the States and a long step toward centralization. He favored giving the majority in Congress the power to remove a justice of that court at any time.

A then pending constitutional amendment making any man ineligible for the Supreme Bench after the age of 70 seems to have been a direct slap at Chief Justice Marshall, who had just reached his seventy-first year.

The week beginning April 4, 1876, fifty years ago, was marked by the beginning of impeachment proceedings against Secretary of War Belknap for taking partnership in a post trader store. The other big incident of the week in the Senate was a savage attack by Mr. McCreary of Kentucky on President Hayes and Secretary of the Treasury Bristow for sanctioning extravagant claims against the Government. The Senate stood 47 Republicans, 29 Democrats.

A report of a special commission on Mexican raids in Texas said the country from Brownsville to Rio Grande City had been laid waste by bandits from over the border. It was put aside.

A proposal to drop the chaplains of the two Houses as a measure of economy was considered. Mr. Randall, Democratic leader, said his party intended to reduce the expenses of government $30,000,000. Mr. Holman reported that total appropriations for the current year would be $179,000,000. There was much debate on the question whether the Postoffice Department could be made to pay its cost, with strong opposition to any carriage of merchandise by mail.

WOMAN CHAMPION COMMENDS GOLF

Cecil Leitch Tells Why the Game Has Grown in Popularity With Her Sex—Calls It Molder of Character

By CECIL LEITCH.

LONDON.

FOR every woman golfer in England twenty years ago there are now a score; the Ladies' Golf Union, formed by a few players in 1803, has risen to a membership of nearly one thousand clubs. This phenomenal increase is due to the advent of the rubber-cored ball. If the old gutta percha ball were in use today very few women would give the game more than one trial. A missed shot with the hard unsympathetic "guttie" was a painful experience.

From the point of view of the weaker sex the new ball has been a boon. The young girl has been supplied with a game in which she has a reasonable chance of becoming proficient; women unable to follow more strenuous branches of sport have now a healthy recreation from which they derive pleasure.

The Virtues of Golf.

Golf is more than a game; it is a molder of character. This remark may be said to apply to any game, but it is especially true of golf, which involves team play, partnership and single combat.

In single contest it is one of the few games in which a player's success is entirely dependent upon ability. This alone will always emphasize the absence of good qualities or presence of faulty traits. One round will provide an observer with deeper insight into a player's character than months of casual acquaintanceship.

Those who take to the game late in life do not expect to excel. But with young players the case may be different, and a girl who shows signs of promise after a short apprenticeship has certain temptations to resist. In the first place, she must not imagine that success in her own club events enables her to conquer all comers in an open field. Overconfidence is a heavy handicap for a young player to carry into senior competitions; local praise may be her undoing.

For this reason the girls' open golf championship in England is a useful nursery. Here a competitor meets opponents of her own age, and fifteen of the sixteen who qualify annually should return to their home clubs with the knowledge that they still have much to learn. The winner must remain conscious of the fact that, successful though she has been in this meeting, the standard of play was inferior to that which she must be prepared to face when she enters for bigger events. Any suspicion of unsportsmanlike behavior would be nipped in the bud immediately at this meeting.

Referring to golf in his "Reminiscences," S. M. J. Woods, the famous Rugby footballer and cricketer, writes: "To become a moderate player I think it is the easiest game I ever attempted; to become a great player, one of the most difficult." Every golfer will admit the great difference that lies between a "good" golfer and a "first-class" golfer.

Hard to Attain First Rank.

Numerous women players are capable of producing a brilliant round at intervals, but this is not good enough for "first class." The latter designation implies "good form consistently." On this point an old player remarked, after a disappointing exhibition in a friendly foursome: "I have come to the conclusion that when I play well nowadays I am off my game." A woman player must not regard an occasional brilliant round as her real form. It is the average which counts.

The skill of a player is similar to that of the proverbial chain "whose strength is equal only to that of its weakest link." Those who do not take the trouble to strengthen the weakest link can never hope to reach thorough excellence. There must be many in this class. Otherwise women players would furnish a larger number of first-class representatives.

Weakness is not necessarily in the actual playing of the game. It is often found in the nerve or temperament of the player. A, who may be a good match player and poor medal player; B, who is the exact opposite to A; C, who is a good foursome partner, but weak in single; D, who is the opposite to C—all would master their individual weakness by correcting their temperament. A low handicap player should be able to play to that handicap in every form of the game.

Young Players Neglected.

There is a tendency on the part of some good players to neglect the younger or weaker exponents of the game. Some English captains are inclined to leave out of their teams the young improving players and to include in their stead those who may have gained in experience but lost in skill. Such training does more to help a young player's game and character than years of ordinary friendly matches among her local club members.

If the older and better women players would mix more freely with the younger and weaker there would then be less cause for complaint regarding "snobbishness in sport." In tennis or team games the inclusion of a poor performer may spoil a match. At golf it should not affect any one's game to be opposed to or partnered by an inferior player.

There was a time—not very long ago—when Mrs. Grundy looked upon women golfers with feelings of disdain. Mr. Grundy's opinions were similarly unkind regarding the pioneers. Apparently he did not object to a woman's presence in the hunting field or on the tennis court, but he considered "the links no place for a woman. First, women talk too much; second, they never stand still; third, if they do stand still the wind won't allow their dresses to stand still." He was further of the opinion that "at golf ladies are simply in the road."

During this period Mrs. Grundy considered that marriage was out of the question for any woman who made golf her form of exercise. She imagined that golfers thought of nothing but the game, that they were useless as far as domestic duties were concerned, that they lost their looks owing to exposure to every kind of weather, that their whole mode of dress and behavior was unattractive.

Judging by the early pictures of women golfers, one must agree with that severe critic regarding clothes. A long full skirt, tightly belted blouse, stiff sailor hat and unsuitable footwear could not be a becoming outfit. It must have been a handicap to the player.

In spite of all adverse criticisms, the pioneers were undaunted and their numbers rapidly increased. Now we find women's golf is considered one of the subjects of public and international interest and is given a prominent place in modern journalism. What is still more to the point, golf has been proved to be compatible with matrimony!

Men Come to Praise.

Among the spectators at any large women's meeting there is always a large proportion of men. They come to praise (and in many cases to envy) the skill displayed by those whose maternal ancestors were unwelcome on the links. Further marking the change that has occurred in a quarter of a century, the ladies' open championship in England and other important events are now played for over the full course of a men's club.

Evidence of a husband's pride in his wife's play is furnished by an incident that happened at a late round in a championship meeting. Two spectators joined a match in which a previously unknown player was creating a surprise by passing into the next round. One of the spectators turned to her friend and said, "Who is this woman and where does she come from?" Before her friend could answer a man near by quickly stated: "That's Mrs. Blank and I am Mr. Blank." This case of reflected glory is on a par with that of the man who, on marrying a well-known golfer, remarked to a pal, "I suppose in future I shall be referred to as ——'s husband!"

Cupid as Caddy.

Further proofs of the change in the attitude toward women's golf are to be found in the popularity of mixed foursome events. The entry for the Worplesdon mixed foursome includes many married couples and the readiness of men to play in this particular event is shown by the number who apply for partners. Mrs. Grundy has had to alter her views about women on the links. It has recently been observed that "more marriages are now arranged on the links than in the ballroom."

With more suitable clothes the present-day golfer is able to emulate more or less the methods adopted by the stronger sex, and the old-fashioned full smooth swing has disappeared with the clothes of its period. With the help of designers of golfing clothes (who are themselves devotees of the game), the modern women golfers can be, and are, most attractively turned out.

To turn to the question of character: Where better can one study this than during the playing of a round of golf?

One's Faults Exposed.

Every good or faulty trait is eventually brought to light on a golf course. When one hears a player grumbling about bad luck, one is led to think that it is the lack of spirit to deal with difficulty which causes the complaint. The impression left upon all concerned by the player who takes the rough with the smooth and keeps smiling when facing fearful odds is a contrast to that left by the grumbler.

There are women players whose actual play is decidedly inferior to their own opinions of it, but perhaps they are more to be pitied than condemned. One of these (whose identity must be concealed behind the letter "A"), was readily offering to play the best player at an English holiday resort, and freely offered strokes. "A" invariably volunteered the information that she always gave "B" (one of the best players present), two strokes. A few inquiries revealed the fact that "A" certainly had given "B" two strokes a round; but in the many games played "A" had always been severely defeated.

No English Golf Widows.

Apropos of which the following story may be told. A golfer was discovered in a corner of the clubroom looking very depressed. Questioned by a friend as to the cause, the golfer said that he and his partner had just come in from a round in which they were beaten. The friend expressed surprise that this should cause such depression and was then told that the result was ten and nine. "Ten and nine?" said the friend. "Yes, replied the player. "You see we were giving them one up."

The veracity of this story is not vouched for, but if it, and others similar, were true, the golf widow would perhaps be deserving of a little sympathy. But even the golf widow is becoming extinct in England and the golf widower is difficult to find. None ever heard of a non-golfing husband who, on marrying a golfing wife, insisted upon her giving up the game—or vice versa. What usually happens is that the non-golfer of the partnership immediately takes to the game and becomes wildly enthusiastic over it. Women golfers are exceptionally versatile. Their work during the war was proof of this. In these post-war days the majority of unmarried women golfers in England follow some profession or occupation.

OLD GUARD STEPS INTO 100TH YEAR

Will March Down Fifth Avenue Next Thursday And Hold a Memorial Service—On Its Rolls Are Members Over Eighty Years Old

TO the sound of martial music the Old Guard of the City of New York will march down Fifth Avenue on Thursday in celebration of the one hundredth anniversary of its founding. An impressive program has been prepared for observance of the centenary of one of New York's colorful and ancient military organizations, including a memorial service at St. Thomas's Church conducted by Bishop Manning and a dinner in the evening.

The Old Guard, which began its existence in 1826, may be considered the ancestor of the present National Guard of New York. At the Centennial Exhibition in Philadelphia in 1876 the Old Guard represented the State of New York in the march of the Centennial Legion, made up of historic old line military commands from each of the original thirteen States, many of them dating back to the days of the Revolution. This year at Philadelphia's sesquicentennial the Old Guard again will be honored when there will be presented to it on the 149th anniversary of the adoption by Congress of the Stars and Stripes an authentic copy of the Washington's Headquarters Flag, the original of which is preserved in the Valley Forge Museum.

The tall bearskin shakos, the white swallow-tail coats and blue trousers of the Old Guard on parade make a uniform that has never failed to impress spectators. Included in the membership of the organization are veterans of the army, navy and National Guard; on its roster are men who have passed the age of eighty. Among its honorary members are such notables as President Coolidge, Governor Smith, the King of the Belgians, the Prince of Wales, General Pershing, Marshals Foch and Joffre, Field Marshal Haig, General Diaz of Italy, Sir Thomas Lipton and a host of other celebrated soldiers, sailors and citizens.

When Uniform Was Changed.

The Old Guard began existence as the "Tompkins Blues" under the command of Captain William W. Tompkins. The Boston Light Infantry had paid a visit to Manhattan and inspired the idea of an independent military organization in this city. In 1830 Captain Tompkins was succeeded by Edward Vincent as Commander and three years later the company adopted the name of the Light Guard.

"A complete change was at the same time made in the uniform," says a contemporary service periodical, "which consists now of a scarlet coat, faced with blue and gold trimmings, white worsted wings, very dark cassimere pantaloons with scarlet stripes, and bearskin cap with red cocktail plume, that uniform being the same or nearly in every particular with that worn by the Coldstream Guards." Even in the days of its infancy the Old Guard, it seems, was noted for the splendor of its uniform, surprisingly enough taken from that of the country with which the United States not so long before had been at war.

Previous to the organization of the Tompkins Blues New York City had not had a militia company that was familiar with either drill or discipline. From the Tompkins Blues was formed the militia model of the period and on its foundation were built the outstanding features of the present National Guard. Other independent military companies sprang up along the lines of the Tompkins Blues and the rivalry was such that a number of members of the first organization resigned to form the City Guard under Captain William M. McArdle. By this time the Tompkins Blues had changed their name to the Light-Guard.

Merger of Rivals.

Just before the Civil War the Light Guard became Company A of the Seventy-first Infantry, New York, and the City Guard entered the Ninth Regiment. Both organizations had become famous for their service to city and State and when the Civil War began they entered immediately on active duty. The Light Guard played a prominent part in the battle of Bull Run; the City Guard served for a long time in the Army of the Potomac and both companies furnished from their members a long list of officers of distinction.

At the close of the Civil War when most of the former independent military organizations of New York either had passed away or had lost their earlier significance a reunion was held of the surviving members of the Light Guard and the City Guard. On April 22, 1868, a permanent organization was formed from the two companies and became known as the Old Guard of the City of New York. From that date until the present its services on public occasions have brought it a wide reputation, backed by its many decades of traditions.

When the Tompkins Blues were organized John Quincy Adams was President of the United States and among the leading figures in public life were Webster, Clay, Jackson and Calhoun. A century may seem a long time ago, but none the less there is still an active link between the Old Guard of today and the Tompkins Blues of 1826. Captain Andrew Calhoun, a descendant of the early Vice President, is still in active service with the Old Guard despite his eighty-odd years. Captain Frederick Phillips is a descendant of Jonas B. Phillips, whose name was on the original roster of the Light Guard.

At its headquarters in West Ninety-first Street the Old Guard possesses a valuable collection of military memorabilia — Revolutionary flintlocks, swords, uniforms and battle trophies. Today the Old Guard differs in character from the original organization; it cooperates with, instead of maintaining independence of, the national military policy. The Old Guard is a part of the State Militia and is under the supervision of the Adjutant General of the State of New York. Its officers receive their commissions from the Governor.

Major Edward Havemeyer Snyder was elected commandant for the ninth consecutive term at the annual meeting held a short while ago. The other officers are: Honorary Staff—Captain Charles H. Huestis, First Lieutenant Benjamin F. Moore, Second Lieutenant Daniel A. O'Mara; Company A—Captain Philip S. Tilden, First Lieutenant George Panopulo, Second Lieutenant Philip L. Clarke; Company B—Captain Henry W. Kurtz, First Lieutenant L. Marvin Simmons, Second Lieutenant Albert Eggerdon Davis, Acting Adjutant.

BRITISH PRINTERS WANT A TWO-CENT POSTAGE

LETTERS mailed from the United States to Europe are conveyed all the way for 2 cents, a fact that is arousing the people in Great Britain, especially those in the printing trade, because they have to pay the equivalent of 3 cents to send a letter to this side of the Atlantic. They have recently expressed themselves in forceful (if parliamentary) language to the Postmaster General.

Henniker Heaton, son of Lieut. Col. Heaton, watching mail steamers on the Thames and the Medway, became impressed with the utility of world-wide interchange of ideas by post. He sailed to Australia, obtained employment wit a firm of newspaper proprietors in New South Wales, and in time inherited lands and newspapers sufficient to maintain him and to permit him to realize his ambition for worldwide "penny postage."

Twelve years of hard work enabled him to carry his British imperial penny (two-cent) postage scheme in 1898, and he arranged the Anglo-American penny post in 1907. He introduced telegraph money orders in England, and the parcels post scheme into France. For these deeds he was honored with the freedom of the cities of London and Canterbury. He refused the proffer of a knighthood of St. Michael and St. George, but accepted a baronetcy.

Despite his several reforms, British printers are now indignant because they have to pay 50 per cent. more for a westbound letter than for one traveling east. Hence the voluble expressions of protest just addressed to the British Postmaster General, and his urbane reply that it is the ambition of the present British Government to re-establish imperial and American penny postage before relinquishing office.

CULPRIT CROW IS CREDITED WITH MUCH USEFUL SERVICE

CROWS often become so numerous that measures are necessary to reduce their numbers, Specialists of the Biological Survey of the Department of Agriculture have observed the feeding habits of crows for many years, and have studied under the microscope the contents of thousands of their stomachs collected in all parts of the country. They find that not all the habits of the common crow are blacker than the bird itself, for its size, vitality and almost omnivorous appetite make it a great influence for good at certain seasons in many localities.

Recently an effective trap for capturing crows was devised on the Miner Bird Refuge, in Ontario, Canada, and offered for use in any part of the United States. For the protection of desirable birds coming to this sanctuary the trap was developed, and its operation has been so successful that as many as 500 crows have been caught in it at one time. The Biological Survey recently sent one of its scientists to Ontario to note the operation and effectiveness of the trap and to report on the practicability of using duplicates of it in places where local anti-crow campaigns might be recommended by the bureau. The trap, which is about six feet high and the size of a large room, is covered with poultry wire and operated by means of a wire from a blind. The authorities at Washington will tell any one how to build it.

Where there has been an overabundance of crows and their regular food supply has been depleted, both the common crow and its smaller brother, the fish crow, have been observed preying upon nests and eggs of other birds. Depredations of the fish crow have been especially noted at breeding colonies of herons, pelicans, terns, rails and others in the South. In the interior and as far north as Southern Canada the common crow frequently turns its attention to the nests and eggs of upland game birds and waterfowl when its regular food fails, and it is destructive also to poultry. In some places these birds kill even larger animals that have become weakened through injury.

In spite of the objectionable habits of crows under certain conditions these birds are beneficial to the farmer in preying upon the pests of his crops. Even in areas where their injurious habits seem pronounced, preventive measures rather than destruction will often put an end to complaints against crows and still allow the birds to continue their useful work of destroying harmful insects.

SLEEPING SICKNESS LEAVES ODD EFFECT

CURIOUS after-effects of sleeping sickness are brought to light in an English Magistrate's Court. A ten-year-old boy has gone in for petty crime with a vengeance. His last offense was the theft of a tricycle, and before that he was found spending stolen money at a bazaar. Often he would take off his shoes and stockings and, simulating extreme poverty, beg in the streets. Three years ago the boy had sleeping sickness, and all his misdemeanors are said to date from that time.

PRINCE'S EXERCISE

SINCE returning from the Southern Atlantic the Prince of Wales has kept himself fit by rising early and taking exercise, often on horseback. He still enjoys riding to hounds. He does not grow heavy with increasing age. When recently visiting the British industries fair at Birmingham the Prince weighed himself. The machine registered 13[illegible] pounds.

SWEDEN'S FORESTS

OF Sweden's land area of 158,[illegible] square miles, about 52 per cent is forested. Two-thirds of the productive forest area is north of the Dal River, while the southern part of the country has to a great extent been cleared for cultivation.

TURKS WANT SEA TRADE

THE coastwise shipping trade of Turkey is to be a Turkish monopoly after June 1. No foreign vessels will be allowed to carry on coastwise trade between Turkish ports of the Black Sea and the Mediterranean. To assure the carrying out of the service, Turkey will have to build several vessels.

What is the future of America?

Is industrial America about to crumble, or is it headed forward to unprecedented prosperity? Are we going at too fast a pace? Does the United States need a new national business policy? Will the present period of high wages end shortly? Are the mergers now taking place in the major industries necessary?

These are but a few of the questions statesmen, business men and industrial leaders are concerning themselves with today—questions that unthread the economic fabric of future existence—questions that personally affect every man, woman and child directly or indirectly. To know the answers to these and other economic questions is to open up a new vista of understanding on what the future holds for America—Read

Giving for the First Time the Real Economic Philosophy of this Great Man

For the first time you have the opportunity of glimpsing into the workings of a mind possessed by the most successful captain of industry the world has ever known. Let Henry Ford tell you the magic formula by which he carries his gigantic burden—a business employing 200,000 workers, not one of whom receives less than $6.00 per day, which, including allied plants, provides a living for more than 3,000,000 people.
His achievements are so unparalleled that this, his first authoritative utterance in years, compels attention.

He declares that: "Dishonest men do sometimes succeed; but only when they give service that exceeds their dishonesty. Honest men sometimes fail because they lack other essential qualities."—"High wages cannot be paid to any one just for the asking."—"If all profits were given to workers, improvements would not be possible." Read Ford's thoughts on the new order of things; his views on efficiency; his ideas on finance, and you obtain a complete study of economics in a new understandable form.

RED MEN TAKE UP CIVILIZED WAYS

Only 20 of the 371 Tribes Hold to the Tepee—Wealth of the Various Nations Increases Constantly—Many Farmers

APRIL 19 marks the 110th anniversary of the first Indian Enabling act. In other words, 110 years have elapsed since America's first official effort to cooperate with the Indian tribes was begun. During this period volumes of speeches about the Indian and his fate have been delivered in Congress.

Not only Congress, but various civic associations have expressed their sorrow over the plight of the Indian, while America's treatment of the vanishing tribes has furnished the basis for many books.

The general condition of the Indian today is the reverse of that prophesied years ago. In 1789 Henry Knox, Secretary of War, predicted that in fifty years the aboriginal nomadic Indians would be reduced "to a very small number." In 1864 the Indians were regarded as war-makers beyond redemption. About that time a Secretary of the Interior remarked that their total destruction "has been openly advocated by gentlemen of high position, intelligence and personal character."

Yet the present statistical survey of the Indian is far from depressing. There are 340,907 people rated as Indians in the United States, though not a few of them are half-bloods. Some sit in Congress, some are in business and the professions, some of them are in professional sport, others are in the army and navy. This total is an increase of 13,500 in the last ten years. Government hospitals and health care have decreased the Indian death rate from 22.33 per 1,000 in 1920 to 32.24 in 1925.

Adopting Civilization.

Of the various Indian tribes remaining there are 371 speaking 58 different languages. But of all these tribes there are only twenty where the majority live in tepees, wickiups or hogans. Most of them prefer regular houses "with all modern conveniences." The few tribes that prefer the old traditions and will not follow the younger generations are living on reservations in six different States. Arizona has the largest settlement; California and New Mexico come next.

The number of Indians, men and women, who prefer the more comfortable quarters of modern civilization are increasing. The Government's most recent count shows that 44,220 families live in permanent houses that are to all intents and purposes as good or even better than those of the average white American. About 50,000 of the Indians, male and female, are voters who exercise their franchise. Equal suffrage among them has been well and long established.

It is obviously right that the Government should see that the Indian is protected in his land holdings. Values have risen till the Indian is land wealthy. Indian farmers number 40,962, and they are cultivating with modern agricultural equipment more than 890,700 acres. The value of the steers owned by Indians has been estimated at more than $35,000,000.

In 1922 there were 28,940,234 barrels of oil produced on lands of the Osage Nation Indians. Of the value of this, $11,700 per capita was distributed to them from royalties and bonuses. This tribe alone has received more than $111,863,530 from their oil. The Osage Nation is but one of the Five Civilized Tribes of Oklahoma that number in all 103,200 in number.

Money in Bank.

There are 1,392,379 acres of irrigable Indian land, and of land actually irrigated 866,000 acres. The Federal Government has expended large amounts of money to bring water to these Indian lands, totaling thus far $25,592,436. On land that is reserved to the Indians there is estimated to be 35,000,000,000 board feet of timber, valued at $100,000,000.

Land and cattle and houses and citizenship are not the only Indian possessions. There are vast sums of cash in bank to the credit of Indians. Tribal funds held in trust by the Government on interest at 3 to 5 per cent. amount to $25,000,000; bank deposits of individual Indians now aggregate more than $35,000,000. Besides, the Indians of their own free will invested $25,000,000 in Liberty bonds.

The Indians themselves are asserting their rights in a way familiar to the whites—by organization. In Washington recently nine tribes formed the National Council of American Indians. Its purpose is "the welfare of the Indians, the protection of their property and the advancement among them of the advantages of civilization."

Association with the white man has made the Indian anxious to have more of the "advantages of civilization." By a curious coincidence, the formation of the National Council of Indians was organized not far from the spot where the powerful Algonquin tribes once held periodic council. There is no doubt of the influence already exerted by this Indian organization. Congress is being importuned for a thorough investigation of Indian affairs.

FRANCE HONORS WEST POINTERS

A SYMBOL of the bond of friendship existing between two great military schools, the Ecole Polytechnique of France and the United States Military Academy at West Point, has just been presented to the Corps of Cadets at West Point by the French military students. It takes the form of a replica of a statue that is part of the monument erected to the comrades of the Ecole Polytechnique who were killed during the World War. The statue is of gilt bronze.

The presentation was made by Major Jean Borotra, the French tennis player, himself a graduate of the Ecole Polytechnique, at the office of the Commandant of Cadets, Brig. Gen. March B. Stewart, and the statue was received by Cadet Captain Raymond C. Maude, who with the entire cadet commissioned staff was paraded with the senior officers of the Academy.

In his presentation speech Major Borotra said: "I need not recall to you the bonds that have connected our two schools for nearly a century, which originated in a message from your students to ours, brought by Lafayette in 1830. I cannot help reminding you that our two schools, which were founded about the same time, have always had identical aims, and that the motto chosen by Napoleon for the flag of the Ecole Polytechnique, 'Pour la Patrie, les sciences et la gloire'—for the fatherland, for science, and for glory—also sums up the noble traditions of West Point.

"Recently when the Ecole Polytechnique erected in its court of honor a monument to the glory of the Polytechnicians—nearly one thousand of them—who fell while defending our common ideals, they thought of perpetuating the memory of our fraternity of arms by presenting to West Point a reproduction of the statue that rises in front of the stone memorial on which are engraved the glorious names of the dead."

General Stewart, in his speech of acceptance, said:

"On behalf of the Corps of Cadets, I accept this statue with a deep realization of the spirit that prompted its presentation to the academy. I thank you, and through you, the students of the Ecole Polytechnique, for this fine gesture of comradeship, and I assure you that the Corps of Cadets will treasure this statue as one more symbol of a friendship that has united our two schools in the light of common aims and ideals during the past hundred years."

Major Borotra presented with the statue a letter from the student body of the Ecole Polytechnique to the Corps of Cadets, which said, after referring to the unveiling of the monument on Oct. 24, 1925: "We believe that the reproduction of this monument should be in the possession of our brothers in arms of the United States Military Academy as a token of the fraternal union of our two countries, united in a common aim to safeguard the liberty of the world and led to a common victory by our immortal graduate, Marshal Foch."

AMERICANS OPERATE 15,000-ACRE FARMING EXPERIMENT IN RUSSIA

AN American corporation, the Russian Reconstruction Farms Company, is operating 15,000 acres of land in Southeastern Russia as a model agricultural experimental and demonstration station. An effort is being made not only to save the wheat crops of Russia but to teach the peasants the proper methods of developing Russia's chief source of wealth, the land.

A demonstration farm school is conducted where peasants are taught modern agricultural methods, tractor cultivation, crop rotation, soil fertilization and the essential conservation of moisture through deeper plowing and adequate harrowing. An agricultural service centre is also maintained, including a machine shop. Educational and health work are done among the peasants as subsidiary work, standards of living being thus slowly raised.

The idea for this laboratory experiment arose from Russian famine relief work through tractor operation in the Summer of 1922. High officials of the Russian Government were interested, and two years later a concession of undeveloped land in the Ukraine was negotiated.

The Russian Reconstruction Farms Company is incorporated under the laws of New York State, and among those endorsing the project are Dr. Charles W. Eliot, President Emeritus of Harvard; Wells A. Sherman of the United States Department of Agriculture; R. L. Watts, Dean of Agriculture of Pennsylvania State College; David Starr Jordan of Stanford, and Mary S. Woolley, President of Mount Holyoke College.

JUSTICE WHITE IN BRONZE ROBES

Louisiana Erects a Statue Near Where, as a Young Man, the Head of the Supreme Court Studied Law

AGAIN Louisiana has honored a native son. A few days ago, on the terrace of the court house in Royal Street, New Orleans, that famous thoroughfare so closely linked with the name of Louisiana, the statue of the late Chief Justice Edward Douglas White was unveiled. In his bronze robes of justice he stands just a stone's throw from the office where in days following the Civil War he learned the rudiments of the law, whose honored interpreter he was to become.

It was here that he made his start, and, laying aside his robe of office, it was to Louisiana he turned in vacation season. Soon after his death the State voted an appropriation of $15,000 for a monument to be placed in the Washington hall of fame. When Mrs. White, the late Chief Justice's widow, heard of this, she wrote to the Governor of Louisiana and to John Dart, head of the committee in charge, stating that she believed it would be her husband's wish to have the statue in Louisiana rather than in Washington.

It was also Mrs. White's suggestion that the statue be placed in Royal Street, somewhere near the court house. This suggestion was acted upon. Bryant Baker, an English sculptor, was commissioned and on April 8, in the presence of the Judicial Department of the State, city officials, Mrs. White and others, Governor Henry L. Fuqua of Louisiana officially presented the statue to the City of New Orleans.

Edward Douglas White was born on Nov. 5, 1845, in an ancestral plantation home on Bayou Lafourche. His grandfather was associated with Governor Claiborne of historic fame, and his father was a Governor of Louisiana. It was in a simple, wide-galleried plantation home that the boy grew up. A few miles away was the land of Acadie, home of the storied Evangeline—St. Martinville, called Little Paris, because of the number of Parisians of culture who had settled there. In this atmosphere he passed his early impressionable years.

While he was away at school in the North the Civil War broke out, and against the wishes of his family, who thought him too young, the youth fought under the Confederate flag. At the close of the war he went to New Orleans to study law. In a dingy office around the corner from the Cabildo and in an honorable and ancient firm that demanded of its associates scholarship as well as legal astuteness his career began. In 1868 he was admitted to the bar.

With his first case came prominence. Before the Civil War each property owner was responsible for the maintenance of the levee in front of his property. As a result of ensuring impoverishment a war-time amendment had been passed that provided for public care of these levees.

But now the war was over. White's first case was in defense of a property owner sued by Jefferson Parish for the recovery of money expended in the construction of a levee. White argued that the war-time arrangement supplanted the former law, and that the ancient private duty had become a public responsibility. To the surprise of every one concerned, the young lawyer won his first case, thereby paving the way for the present system of public maintenance of levees.

A Judge at 35.

From this time on his reputation grew. Activity in delivering the State from negro rule added to his personal popularity. He was politically active, and in 1879, when but 35 years of age, he was appointed to the Supreme Court of Louisiana. At this time the Supreme Court was housed in the Cabildo of ancient fame. In 1880 he retired and entered private practice. In 1889 he took the oath of office as a member of the Supreme Court of the United States, and in 1910 was made Chief Justice by President Taft.

Down on Bayou Lafourche Justice White's neighbors like to talk of him. Many of them came to the city for the unveiling of the statue. Until a few years before his death the late Chief Justice owned the plantation on Bayou Lafourche, where he was born. For many years he and his brothers managed the sugar plantation, and during this time Mr. White came, sometimes twice a year, to visit his old home. He would go from house to house greeting the friends of his childhood.

The man who was said to have been the ideal Chief Justice—in bearing, demeanor and physique, as well as in ability—now surveys the street where once he walked, law books under his arm. Royal Street has added another story to its already impressive list of romances.

Every woman would want to shake hands with these men

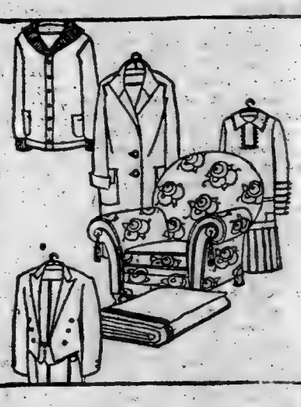
THERE HAD NEVER BEEN an infallible method of preventing moth-damage. A group of men experimented for 18 months to find one. And found it! They produced Larvex.

Then they tested it. Hundreds of woolen samples were cut up. Half were mothproofed with Larvex. Half were not. All were covered with moth-worms. (Only moth-worms eat. Moths are harmless. They merely lay eggs which hatch into moth-worms.)

Months passed. The samples which were not mothproofed were eaten—all of them. But there wasn't a single moth-hole in any sample protected with Larvex. These tests proved Larvex to be the greatest protection against moth-damage ever discovered.

Only $1. to keep $200. worth of valuable woolens moth-free!

Your husband's overcoat, your winter coat, suits, all things woolen in your home—Protect them with Larvex. Use Larvex to mothproof—



Last year over 1,000,000 women protected their woolen things with Larvex. It will protect yours, too. Simply spray it thoroughly on anything woolen. It penetrates the wool fibres and becomes part of the cloth—makes the cloth itself mothproof, makes woolen things as distasteful to moth-worms as cotton or paper. One thorough spraying lasts an entire season.

LETTERS TO THE EDITOR

OUR WAR DEBT POLICY

Views of Readers for and Against the Proposal to Cancel the Obligations of the Allies To America

To the Editor of The New York Times:

On your editorial page of edition of April 3 you printed a letter by Frederick W. Peabody.

I object to various statements in Mr. Peabody's letter, such as calling France and Italy "our allies," as, according to statements at various times made by President Wilson, we were never "allied" with any of the belligerent nations, but gave our help to them, furnished them with supplies and other necessary articles. Nor did France or Italy fight any war for us, as we easily could fight all wars successfully, just as we have done in years gone by. We did not fight Germany in order to help either France, or Italy, or Russia, or Guatemala, or China, or Rumania, or any of the other of those "allies," but we started war against the German Government when American honor was at stake. In my belief the allied powers were very happy when we came in and when we could not be accused any longer of unneutral acts by furnishing them all materials necessary for them, and they, in my belief, would gladly have paid a much higher price than was charged to them.

The war, which was fought by the Allies to abolish militarism and to knock the German ruler's despotism into a cocked hat, turned out at the end to have been a war to grab as much territory as possible. I do not blame France for taking back Alsace-Lorraine, but there were other territories grabbed by all the Allies, in order not only to enrich themselves on other peoples' possessions, but also in order to enable themselves to gain additional future human fighting material. I am sure, if the United States would propose to barter some of the indebtedness of the Allies for such territories as they grabbed, a great howl would start about the American Shylocks. England and France grabbed all of German African possessions. Furthermore, England took all Pacific islands south of the Equator, also part of Borneo. Poland grabbed part of the heart of Germany in order to have an outlet to the sea, as if Switzerland or Bolivia ever had or needed an outlet to the sea, or Paraguay or Afghanistan.

I respectfully suggest to Mr. Peabody to put himself in communication with those various nations and propose to them that they should turn over to the United States these various territories, such as Mesopotamia, &c., in consideration of a cancellation of their war indebtedness, and after getting his reply either affirmative or negative it will be time to again write a letter to THE NEW YORK TIMES. FRED STERNBERG.

War Debts for Education.

To the Editor of The New York Times:

The psychology of what we may call the higher American sentiment concerning the cancellation of foreign war debts appears to run somewhat as follows:

(1) The world has suffered a bad case of temporary insanity, or what the psychiatrists call "conflict," dissociated personality, and has done itself much damage.

(2) The larger morality, that is, loyalty to humanity as a whole, would pool the penalty—divide it as justly as possible among all concerned.

(3) But conditions in Europe are such that if this were done her energy of relief would soon be expended in new wars. To keep her peaceful, we must keep her poor.

Now, why can we not all share the burden, using the European payments to establish a fund for international education? One object would be to aid all nations and peoples wherever illiteracy is high; another, to school the rising generation away from war. If we could also establish a world university and a universal research fund, so much the better. With such an armament of dollars, pounds, francs, marks and lire, what could our scientists and educators not do for our poor old planet?

Let me add that this is not another plan for urging entrance into the League of Nations; for on the principle by which we separate our school boards from our city councils, the world education fund could perhaps best be administered by a separate international commission—a commission on which educators ought to occupy a position of prominence.

When we remitted the Boxer indemnity to China, she used the money for sending Chinese students to America and educating them here. Let us enlarge this text into a sermon; that is, let us encourage a wholesale exchange of students between countries and a cosmopolitan gathering at our world university.

D. W. LARUE.

East Stroudsburg, Pa., April 12, 1926.

Two Points Considered.

To the Editor of The New York Times:

There are two subjects which should be carefully considered before we do any canceling of European debts.

1. Until the world calms down, it won't do any harm, and may do a great deal of good in the prevention of war, for the nations to stagger along under a burden of heavy taxation.

2. The cancellation of the debts would establish a very dangerous precedent. The course of procedure in future wars would be to get America into the conflict by hook or crook and then let her bear the financial burden.

If Europe ever hopes to have America take any part in her future conflicts to preserve civilization, it would be well for her to keep her credit good. F. J. STONE.

Ability to Pay.

To the Editor of The New York Times:

I believe that the voice of the people has been heard through our statesmen who have been negotiating with the foreign nations for the payment of loans and the refunding of unpaid interest to the extent of each nation's individual ability. Do not forget that these foreign nations had borrowed from each other until their treasuries were dry and their backs were to the wall so far as their financial ability to continue the war was concerned, and if they did not "carry on" they faced probable servitude to Germany. Then they came to us, we did not go to them, asking for funds to carry on a war which looked to them almost hopelessly lost. They did not admit this at the time—they could not afford to—but the handwriting was on the wall. And our people loaned almost without stint.

I think that the committee in Washington which Congress has empowered to make such settlements with the various nations to the extent of each nation's ability to pay us probably knows more about the conditions in each debtor nation and its ability to pay than either you or I.

What of it if that money did not leave the United States? The Allies did not want money. They wanted what it would buy and what we were in a position to supply them with—guns, rifles, shells, grain and a multitude of other supplies for their armies, to save them from the greatest and most disastrous defeat that any nations would have suffered in the history of the world. Our money saved them from probable servitude had Germany been victorious.

No one will gainsay that if the Allies had been beaten, the United States would have been the next country to have been attacked by Germany, and I am only fearful that jealousy will some day cause some of our allies of yesteryear to attack us, and I fear that it will come just as soon as those allies are sufficiently rehabilitated physically and financially to think that they are able to lick us. But they were not fighting our battles. Do you think for a moment that England, France and Italy were fighting for our protection? Certainly not! They were fighting to save their own hides, fighting a war partly brought on by alliances and secret diplomacy, and when Mr. Wilson was at last forced to yield to public clamor and declare war we added the straw, the last final kick, necessary to break Germany's back and make her sue for peace. We ask them to pay not one cent of the billions it cost us to put our armies and navy in the field and thus save them, but to pay to the extent of their individual ability just debts honorably contracted. M. E. T. BROWN,

Westport, Conn., April 10, 1926.

Our Part in the War.

To the Editor of The New York Times:

In all the discussion that is going on the fact is too constantly lost sight of (or deliberately ignored would be a more accurate term) that, even after our formal declaration of a state of war, it was the positive intention of the Government to limit our participation to financial help; or, in other words, to furnish material and not troops. It actually required more than one special embassy from our allies to convince us that a manly share in the war demanded blood as well as bullets.

If we had not by these means at last been forced to send an army to Europe, our contribution would never have been other than pecuniary—and for over a year that is all it was. Does any one mean to say that if our assistance had until the end of the war been restricted to money and munitions we would have demanded reimbursement? Where, then, is the justice of our now insisting on dollar for dollar, plus interest? We might just as logically and properly demand compensation for the blood shed by our soldiers when we did finally take a part in the actual fighting.

JAY ZORN.

New York, April 10, 1926.

A Day of Reckoning.

To the Editor of The New York Times:

It is inconceivable that the grandsons of Italy and France will ever pay the debts which our Representatives in Congress are "putting over." It seems to me that the generous thing to do—the good thing, as a business nation, to do—is to charge up these debts to profit and loss and keep our friends overseas. If we insist on the course we are now pursuing, there will surely come a day of reckoning. We are carefully preparing the field for a greater war for our grandchildren, as who can say that the children of our age and the children yet unborn will continue to come to us for sixty-three years with baskets laden with gold to pay for a war that was as much ours as theirs? If in reality it was not our war, why did we go into it? J. DU BURGE.

NEW DEAL FOR TURKEY

Ratification of the Lausanne Treaty Is Urged on the Strength of the Outlook for A Better Future

To the Editor of The New York Times:

The appeal of the Bishops of the Episcopalian Church concerning the Lausanne Treaty does not appear to be in accord with a keen desire to consider the problem with clear vision or with recourse to those tendencies which make for clear and rational thinking. Obviously the appeal against the treaty is based upon prejudice, sentimentality and the "spirit of the herd." Turkey is far from America. There are few Turks here. On the contrary we have numerous Armenians and Greeks who naturally feel it a duty artfully to employ those methods which most easily fall into line with our usual traditional prejudices. To most of the people of America the Turk is always "terrible," every Greek a bootblack, every Chinese a laundryman, every Italian a laborer. How can we shake off the shackles of the past and project ourselves into the future?

With reference to the republic of Turkey, or any other nation, we must keep in mind the genetic point of view. Facts of today may not be the facts of tomorrow. Neither the world nor civilization is standing still. Turkey of today is not the Turkey of Abdul Hamid. Italy of today is not the Italy of five years ago. Why not drop our "nest habits" and consider things as they are today? It takes a "big" man with the scientific attitude of "the intelligent ignorant learner" to admit facts of today even though they contradict everything he said yesterday.

If we consider "industrialization" as civilization, Turkey is slowly becoming civilized. On the other hand, if we consider civilization with Arnold as the "humanizing of society" or with President Eliot as civilization as consisting in a "state of mind," we must admit that Turkey is becoming rapidly civilized.

We must revise our thinking with respect to Turkey and bring it up to date. Most of us still think of the Turkey under Abdul Hamid, when the "official" stage of national development and thinking was expressed in polygamy, superstition, fanatical religious teachings and the like. This resulted in the judgment which we still insist upon making.

Kemal's keen patriotism for his country bid him shake off the shackles of tradition in his desire for progress. It takes a brave man to rise up and dare to point out the clear road to progress when this involves breaking traditions and habits of thinking centuries old. What happened we well know. The caliphate, the harem, the veil, the fez, were abolished. Fanatical religious orders were suppressed and their licentious and scheming leaders executed when found guilty of political treason. Church and State were separated once for all. Education was revolutionized and woman given her rightful position in society. The capitulations were abolished. The aim was at solidarity and unity and progress. Keen psychological insight was shown in the abolition of the fez. The first law of solidarity is the "consciousness of kind," described by Giddings as "the state of consciousness which, in any being, either high or low in the scale of life, recognizes another conscious being as of like kind with itself." The fez had always distinguished the Moslem from the Christian. We know that our conduct toward those we feel to be like ourselves is reflexly and rationally different from our conduct toward those we feel to be less like ourselves. With the passing of the fez the "outward sign of faith" goes also, and Giddings's theory becomes a law. This latter fact is mentioned because the enemies of Turkey laughingly remark that the change of headgear is a minor matter and fail to grasp its true significance.

The Turkish Republic, in a manner without precedent in history, is breaking the shackles of the past and projecting itself into the future. True, it has a long, hard road ahead, but the changes already put into execution are of tremendous significance psychologically, politically, economically and educationally. The people of Turkey are not responsible for the acts of their forefathers any more than we are responsible for the acts of ours. Neither can the people be expected to throw off all ancient customs and traditions overnight. This must come alone through the synthetic process of education. No nation in the world has faced the problems that Turkey has, having inherited a tremendous debt and the loss of many valuable concessions from the "old régime," foreign intrigue, your government of the past, which demanded that ignorance and fanaticism be maintained at a high level in order that it could be used in the guidance of control.

All these facts are worth considering. Would that we but had all the facts concerning the history of Turkey. Russia's dream of Constantinople and her use of the Armenians as "pawns" in constantly urging them to revolt in order that she might fly to their rescue as Christian brothers; France posing as "the protector of the Christians" for political purposes; England "playing up" to Turkey to offset the aims of the Russians, &c., these and hundreds of other incidents of a country of many tongues and many conceptions of God are vital factors ordinarily left out by those enjoying an "emotional debacle" of thought concerning America's relation to Turkey.

Many of us who have lived in Turkey have felt certain inconvenience, sometimes very greatly, due to the method of administration in the developmental stage. No one with any common sense expects perfection when obviously the adjustment is so tremendous. The spirit of sportsmanship of America and her cosmopolitan ideals will not let the differences in the interpretation of God, the sentimental outpourings of the "dear ego," the fallacies grown venerable with age, nor the schemings of the "concession hunter" affect her attitude toward an understanding and appreciation of a heroic attempt at freedom and a struggle against great odds toward new ideals and against old traditions. CHARLES C. COWELL.

TO ENCOURAGE WALKING

To the Editor of The New York Times:

Referring to your interesting article in last Sunday's TIMES, the most valuable step forward, in a literal sense, that could be made would be to see that all public roads, and as many as possible of the byroads, were compulsorily equipped with sidepaths, more commonly known as footpaths. As it is, comparatively few country roads, or even main roads between cities, have these paths, and pedestrians are forced to walk in the road at imminent danger to their lives from the vast numbers of automobiles.

In Great Britain every road and lane, practically without exception, has a footpath on at least one side, and usually two sides, of the road, and the result is that every week-end sees large numbers of pedestrians hiking out into the country, almost regardless of the weather. I was over there last October and November, and took long walks every week-end, and it was surprising how many men and women of all ages, with or without little knapsacks, were following the same healthful pursuit.

I find it very difficult over here to get my friends to accompany me on these pedestrian excursions, because it is too dangerous to walk side by side on the edge of the road, and to stumble along in the ditches and on the rough tussocks and banks at the roadsides does not make for pleasant walking. I am quite convinced that if we had some sidepaths in this country pedestrians would be much more numerous.

I might also add that the suburban railroads of London, in particular such as the Metropolitan Railroad, get out excellently illustrated and planned booklets giving pedestrian excursions where one can take a train out to one point and make a ten to twenty mile cross-country trip, reaching the same railroad at another point, and their tickets are called "pedestrian excursion tickets," at low rates, which have brought them a great deal of pedestrian custom.

Something of the same kind here would undoubtedly interest pedestrians, and an excellent opportunity would be for the Long Island Railroad to issue such tickets

FAILURE OF LEGAL REFORM

Restatement of the Law by a Committee Possessing Public Confidence a Need of The Time

To the Editor of The New York Times:

I think there is another side to the question discussed in your editorial on "Presumptions in Court" which places the cause for the failure of legal reform at the door of lawyers, and it seems to have been pretty well expressed by Dean Pound of the Harvard Law School when he said in effect that today clients have lawyers and not lawyers clients. The excerpt from Dean Pound's expression on the subject seems so appropriate that I beg your indulgence to quote it:

"Leadership seems to have passed to the client-caretaker. The office of a leader of the bar is a huge business organization. Its function is to advise, to organize, to reorganize and to direct business enterprises, to point out dangers and mark safe channels and chart reefs for the business adventurer and in our older communities to act, as one might say, as a steward for the absentee owners of our industries. The actual administration of justice in the courts interests him only as it discloses reefs or bars or currents to be avoided by the pilot of business men. Thus the leaders of the bar in the cities are coming to be divorced not only from the administration of criminal justice, but from the whole work of the courts, and the most effective check upon judicial administration of justice is ceasing to be operative."

What you say by way of discounting technical legal efforts to prevent the human mind from functioning in court is true as I have observed it.

It is hardly to be desired that we should break down the carefully framed series of negations by which we seek to exclude from the knowledge of Judges and jurors all testimony which does not conform to true conceptions of proper probative character, thus leaving the testimony in our courts to take the wide range that characterizes trials on the Continent of Europe. There is no other country in the world in which rules for the exclusion of evidence are applied with the rigidity and technicality that obtains in the United States. England and her colonies, which follow the course of the common law, have similar rules, but they are applied with a breadth and liberality in favor of getting at the truth not usually found in our courts.

Elihu Root says that our trial practice in the admission and exclusion of evidence does not agree with common sense, the experience or the instincts of any intelligent layman in the country. "And as a consequence," he adds, "while we are aiming to exclude matters which our rules declare to be incompetent or irrelevant or immaterial, we are frequently also excluding the truth. How common it is to see an unsophisticated witness on the stand trying to tell a true story about some event with which he is familiar and continually stopped and bewildered by objections based upon distinctions which do not exist in his mind at all and finally leaving the stand with a feeling that he has been bottled up and not allowed to tell the truth! We apply these same rules with the same rigidity to women, whose minds work in an entirely different way from the minds of any lawyer who ever had anything to do with devising or developing the rules of evidence. It is an exceedingly difficult thing to tell the truth, the whole truth and nothing but the truth on the witness stand, as any lawyer who has been a witness must realize; and the simplest and best way to get that done is to come as near as possible to allowing people to tell their stories their own way. When that is done the matters which have no proper probative effect can be disregarded."

It does not help a case any on its merits to be so technical about evidence. On the contrary, it hurts the case with Judges and juries, and it ought to do so, because there is a false implication that the lawyer who is so very particular about little points is not very confident of the merits of his case. Mr. Root estimates that there are about twenty objections to the admission of evidence in a trial in an American court to one in an English court. A recent observer of the English courts told me he did not hear the exclusion of evidence rule invoked once. A better appreciation of the value of clear, concise English and more careful preparation of cases for trial would do much to improve the situation here.

There is a widespread impression that members of the legal profession have not contributed either to the betterment of legal education or to the improvement of the administration of justice to the extent which the public has a right to expect. I think the obvious reason is that their self-interest has been bound up with the preservation of the status quo. Better educational requirements for future lawyers are to be encouraged; meticulous prescriptions of what these shall be are to be discouraged. The point with this is that what a man really is, his character and his achievement of wisdom in the long run counts most and should in some way be his passport to practice the law. Arbitration is a device which in some few cases may give speedy and satisfactory justice and thus relieve the courts, but it is not the cure-all its sponsors believe. An exhaustive restatement of the law by a committee in which the country at large has confidence, with suggestions as to improvement where complexity, uncertainty and the resulting bad effects upon the administration of justice exist, may serve the present generations in some measure, as do the commentaries of Blackstone and Kent serve some former generations. But we must not look for duplication of the success of those commentaries for we live in a more complex civilization, in an era of specialization.

The requirement of this generation is an intensive collaboration of the field of the law. There has been an enormous increase in the variety and complexity of human relations, and to the multiplication of law reports there seems no end. These things make it impossible for another Marshall to emerge from the routine duties of the bench. Judges are engrossed to the full extent of their physical capacities in the adjudication of cases before them. They have no time to chart courses or to give reflective thoughts to remedial suggestions. A restatement of the law may in the last analysis have its greatest service in focusing public opinion on the rules which regulate, or should regulate, human conduct, and thus quicken the conscience of the dominating elite and his legal caretaker in their relationship, which is justly charged with the responsibility for transforming the legal profession into a business. If this there is hope, as well as in the increased tendency to give the judiciary a freer hand in the administration of justice as befits the particular case within the requirements of a social relationship governed according to principles of law and justice.

EXCERPTS FROM LETTERS ON MANY SUBJECTS

Demands on the Railways.

The railroads have been so great a factor in the prosperity of the past few years that none but the willfully unfair can fail to admit it. To cite that the heavy volume of business was handled without congestion or car shortage and that ten new performance records were made in 1925 tells only half the story. Despite the steady traffic and the excellent conditions which have prevailed, however, the railroads as a whole were able to earn but 4.33 per cent. upon their investment in transportation properties in 1924, although the Interstate Commerce Commission under the Transportation act has deemed 5.75 per cent. to be a fair return. This fact is particularly significant inasmuch as the superior service the railroads are now rendering and the costly improvements that they are forced to make to keep pace with modern business are likely to convey the impression that the railroads as a whole are in a prosperous condition and that an increase in rates is not justified. In 1924 nineteen Class I railroads, ten of them here in the East, operated at a deficit, and many others failed to earn their interest charges. The fact that the rate of return on the investment for all carriers combined was far below that rate determined upon as reasonable surely indicates that the railroads are in no position to finance the improvements made necessary by law (the cost of installing the automatic train controls and the elimination of the grade crossings will run into the hundred millions) without some further compensation for their services. • • • It should be remembered that the transportation problem is an economic rather than a political question. The day when a politician can gain votes by "knocking the railroads" is past. The people are realizing that it is as important to their interests that railway rates be high enough as it is that they be not too high. M. CAYLEY SMITH.

Transportation of Criminals.

Your recent fine editorial, "A Crime Clinic," touches closely upon the subject of penology, the practical sequence of criminology. Without any appeal to altruism, and from an economic standpoint only, have we not for centuries made a mistake in basing punishment upon the principle of vindication of law and lost sight of reformation of character of the criminal? We have put the criminal in a dungeon to brood over imaginary wrongs, have done our best to disqualify him for citizenship and respectability, have crushed out any sense of ideals that he may have and have promoted his evil tendencies. Of course he richly deserved punishment, but as administered has it been an economic success? Harsh treatment has never solved the problem, is not a deterrent, but begets bitter enemity against society. Against elaborate and expensive prisons the "farm colony" idea is a step in advance, bringing the human being into contact with air and light—the free gifts of nature—wholesome and redeeming. Beyond this, transportation should be adopted—placing the major offenders, anarchists, murders and others in confinement on American territory, perhaps on islands, under police jurisdiction, the sexes separated, with teachers and religious advisers and officials all devoted to the reformation of character, and the purpose of restoration, in time, to citizenship and social status in many cases. Speed of English Trains.

In your issue of April 10 the delegation of hotel men from the United States visiting abroad makes mention of the hustling trip made by them from Plymouth to London and speak of having made this 227½ miles in 3 hours and 54 minutes, and particularly as having set a world record for a non-stop. We are in position to take exception to this statement. On July 16, 1923, thirty-four passengers were landed at Plymouth at the unseemly hour of 2 A. M. from the steamship New Amsterdam of the Holland-America Line. After finishing our labors with the customs office, we made arrangements, through the courtesy of the station agent, for a special train to London. After a natural delay in arousing a crew, we left Plymouth as the church clocks struck five (5 A. M.), and through the necessity of making a detour of, as I understood, eighteen miles to allow for traffic that had earlier right of way, we landed at Paddington Station at 8:42 A. M., having made the run of over 240 miles in exactly 3 hours and 42 minutes.

Great Catalonians.

That the great Catalans of the past should not be well know is nothing to wonder at. They were well known in their time, but for several centuries the very word Catalonia was unheard by the peoples of Europe. And now in America, not even the teachers of Spanish know about them, because their job is to teach Castilian and the great Catalans wrote in Catalan (or in Latin). Acting more through sheer ignorance than malice (we hope) these teachers of Spanish literature and history, by excluding Catalan literature, culture and history are more separatistic than any Catalan. An example of this is the only history of Spain (as far as I know) edited for school use in America, written by Mr. Romera Navarro of the University of Pennsylvania, in which the words Catalan and Catalonia do not appear once (except in a map) and everything Catalan is systematically left out. This tour de force is accomplished by simply skipping all the centuries of Catalan greatness. Since the rebirth of the national consciousness thirty years ago, Catalonia has produced the two greatest contemporary poets of Spain—Verdaguer, Maragall—and a swarm of pretty good followers (Cf. Schneeberger's "Anthologie des Poèts Catalans Contemporains," Paris 1922); three out of the four best dramatists—Guimerá, Marquina, Rusiñol, with an array of close seconds like Iglesias, Puig y Ferreter, &c.; in philosophy, Eugenio d'Ors, Alomar; many great men in the sciences; in biology, Pi i Suñer, and Turró; in art, the foremost sculptors of Spain—Clará, Casanovas, Llimona; an amazing number of great painters—Anglada, Mir, Rusiñol, Gris, Beltrán-Masses, and the best cartoonists in the world—Bagaría, Apa. When you keep in mind that Catalonia has but two of the twenty-one million inhabitants of Spain, the contemporary Catalan production in literature, painting and sculpture is nothing short of miraculous. There are more great sculptors and painters in Catalonia now than in all the rest of Spain. (Cf. "L'Art Vivant," Paris, Dec. 1, 1925.)

Court Costs and Taxes.

In your issue of April 11, "Justice for the Poor" presents a bit of sad truth—sad in the respect that our institutions have not yet devised the means of attaining their basic object to give liberty and justice to all; sad in that it remained for some of us to do that which is essentially the duty of our Government to perform. In my opinion, when the Bill of Rights was adopted, there should have been passed simultaneously a law enabling the poor to enjoy their own inalienable rights so nobly declared by our Constitution. For of what use is a plate of tasty soup to me if I have no spoon to eat it with? Of what use are my rights to me if I cannot afford to enforce them or redress their violation? True, my rights are not denied me, they are even emphatically granted to me, but should they be violated I must pay if I want my rights judicially enforced. And so if I haven't the money for it I am compelled to lose even more by not having the wrong done to me righted. • • • Let the Government regard court costs as part of the taxes. It is our fundamental notion of justice that those who need their wrongs righted should not be denied the opportunity. SIMON SCHECHTER.

General Booth.

General Booth, who arrives here from Europe on Tuesday, was rightly welcomed, not only with unanimous enthusiasm by members of the Salvation Army which he so successfully directs, but with whole-hearted warmth by all who know the high value of his work to the United States. He has a fuller knowledge of American conditions, and of the way in which Salvation Army work can best be adapted to those conditions, than is commonly realized. He is in fact an international thinker of high mental and moral calibre and broadest sympathies. "The Salvation Army," he said not long ago, "belongs to no country, but to all countries. It happened to be born in England, but that does not make it English. It may happen that in the future its international headquarters will be found in America. That is quite conceivable, with the growth of the work not only on this continent but across the Pacific."

Drinking Places for Horses.

"Be Kind to Animals Week" seems an appropriate time for calling attention to the great need of drinking places for the 65,000 horses that labor on the streets of New York. As the municipality provides no facilities for watering them, the duty devolves upon private agencies. The New York Women's League for Animals operated fifteen stations in traffic districts all Summer watering many thousands of horses daily. Thirteen were kept going till Christmas, but at present the number is down to six. We appeal to horse lovers to aid us in this humane civic service.

NICARAGUA'S RECOGNITION

To the Editor of The New York Times:

I have read with a great deal of interest an open letter entitled "Nicaragua's Recognition," signed by William C. Godfrey, published in your issue of the 4th inst. In the interests of fair play I would request that you publish this answer to Mr. Godfrey's letter so that your readers can judge for themselves and draw their own conclusions.

On the night of Oct. 24, 1925, General E. Chamorro bought his way into the fortress of Loma de Tiscapa. The fortress of Tiscapa, it might be added, is the only armory in the country and it held all the guns, artillery, ammunition and war equipment owned by the Government. After this "heroic" deed was committed, feeling sure that no resistance could be offered, the "hero," General Chamorro, trained his artillery on President Solórzano's official residence and demanded complete obedience. Within 24 hours, President Solórzano gave in to all the demands made by the "hero," General Chamorro. He, President Solórzano, voided the agreement entered into with the Coalition Party whose votes had elected him to the Chief Magistracy, thereby betraying his constituents. Under pressure from his "friend," Chamorro, President Solórzano also appointed General Chamorro Generalissimo of the Army and ordered the Treasury to pay him, on the spot, $10,000 for so-called "war expenses," which really amounted to a reward for the treason he had committed.

From that day on, President Solórzano was nothing but a puppet in the hands of Dictator Chamorro, who controlled the destinies of the country and tried to give his official acts a semblance of legality by compelling "President" Solórzano to sign all official orders and State papers. Dictator Chamorro ordered the instant dismissal of all members of the Cabinet, of several Governors and several scores of employes of the Solórzano Administration. Persecutions, confiscations and orders of imprisonment directed against political opponents of the dictator followed in short order.

A large armed force was sent to the city of Leon, stronghold of the Liberal Party, with strict orders to bring back the constitutional Vice President, Dr. J. B. Sacasa, "dead or alive," so as to compel him to resign the Vice Presidency. Dr. Sacasa, fortunately, was able to escape and fled to El Salvador, thence to Guatemala and arrived in the United States toward the end of December, 1925. He officially informed the Governments of those countries of what had occurred in Nicaragua and requested all the Governments of Central America to withhold recognition of the de facto Government set up by Dictator Chamorro, as stipulated in the Treaty of Peace dated Feb. 7, 1923, subscribed to by all the countries of Central America, including Nicaragua.

The next step taken by Dictator Chamorro to consolidate his dictatorship was to deny admittance to members of Congress who had been legally elected and whose credentials had been accepted at the previous session of the Legislature. The vacancies thus created were then filled by Chamorro henchmen whom the dictator can depend upon to do his bidding.

This hand-picked, and thoroughly subservient "Congress" could not by any stretch of the imagination be a representative body and instead of legislative power it became, virtually, a Chamorro political club; this organization, in obedience to its master's wishes and with the object in view, of President Solórzano himself acknowledged, of "compelling the Vice President to resign," started false proceedings of impeachment against the Vice President, Dr. J. B. Sacasa, found him "guilty" and imposed a sentence of two years' exile from Nicaragua.

President Solórzano, admitting that his Administration had been a failure, sent his resignation to Congress, but instead of accepting it, Congress gave him leave of absence and instructed him to transfer the executive power to Dictator Chamorro who, in the meantime, had had himself elected "Senator" while the country was in a state of siege and then had Congress appoint him "First Designate" to the Presidency. Later President Solórzano's resignation was accepted by Congress and he himself arrived a few days ago in San Francisco.

I hardly think, in view of the facts stated above, which can easily be verified, that Mr. Godfrey's exposition of Dictator Chamorro's claim for recognition can be taken into consideration.

New York, April 14, 1926.

To the North Pole — and beyond!

Two worlds—the Old and the New—are watching intently the same great endeavor, the attempt to blaze a new trail between them—the trail that leads over the North Pole.

The stories of that endeavor hold a two-fold interest: the appeal of scientific achievement and the lure of adventure in unknown places.

Two gripping chapters in that story will be written by the Byrd and the Amundsen-Ellsworth-Nobile expeditions. They will be related for The Times by the leaders themselves.

The stories will come by wireless, by telegraph, by boat, by dog-sled. They and the pictures will be published in New York, fully copyrighted, only in The New York Times.

By Airplane

A ship is on the seas, carrying in her hold a three-motored airplane, moving toward the North Pole—and beyond! She is the Chantier, carrying Lieut. Commander Richard E. Byrd and his crew, and she is bound for King's Bay, Spitzbergen.

From Spitzbergen, Commander Byrd will fly with his companion—Floyd Bennett, naval aviation pilot—to Peary Land, Greenland, over areas hitherto unseen by man. There he will establish a base and then attempt the flight to the Pole and to the unknown regions that rim it.

The plane is equipped with wireless and will report its progress over the Arctic wastes.

By Dirigible

The airship Norge is at Leningrad, making ready to sail for Spitzbergen and then for the North Pole—and beyond! From Rome she has flown to Pulham, to Oslo, and thence to her station in Russia, stirring Europe to thoughts of her daring voyage.

At Spitzbergen, Captain Roald Amundsen and Lincoln Ellsworth—heroes of last year's great Polar exploit—will board the Norge and, with Colonel Umberto Nobile, begin the great adventure—the flight over the roof of the world, over the Pole, into the vast unexplored area of the Arctic, and on to Point Barrow.

The Norge is equipped with wireless and she will flash news of her progress throughout the flight.

SALEM'S 300 EVENTFUL YEARS

Town of Witchcraft and Clipper Ships Completes Its Third Busy Century

By STEUART M. EMERY.

IN a year notable for anniversary observances, the tercentenary of the settlement of Salem, Mass., which occurs in July, promises to recreate history of more than ordinary vividness. The old Puritan rule, with all its stern virtues and faults, the days of a mighty merchant fleet that carried the sails of the city's ships to far seas, and that gloomy chapter known the world over as the "witchcraft delusion" are sufficient to endow the Salem celebration with a richly colored background.

There has been a vigorous discussion as to the actual date of the founding of the town, a descendant of the Endicott family holding that the real founding was in 1628, when Captain John Endicott and his band of a hundred followers arrived at the old site of Naumkeag. The Mayor of Salem has announced, however, that the pioneer date established by Roger Conant in 1626 will be regarded as official, and that the celebration will go through this year as planned.

It is a long way back to the days when the quiet streets of the New England town beheld a series of scenes that cannot be forgotten. A special Court of Oyer and Terminer had been created by Sir William Phipps, Governor of the Province under the royal charter, for the trial of witchcraft cases; it was sitting in the court house on Town House Lane. Through the streets from the jail in Prison Lane unhappy men and women accused of witchcraft were hustled to a trial that was anything but judicial.

A Vivid Page of History.

All Salem seethed over what it looked upon as the attempt of the powers of darkness to destroy the Christian Church in New England. The "witchcraft delusion," cruel and senseless as it was, remains the most vivid page in all of Salem's history.

Sixty-six years before, Roger Conant and his band of English planters and fishermen had left Cape Ann and made their way to Naumkeag, to be followed in 1628 by Captain John Endicott and his colonists, who possessed a charter from the English company that claimed the rights to the land. The early history of Salem was to be the tale of a town built on a foundation of honest toil and stern devotion.

Here were the real Puritan adventurers, seeking to wrest a living from the rough soil and to build habitations they could call their own. The woods teemed with savages. Treaties were made with them while the colonists with axe and adz hewed their houses out of the timber of the new wilderness. Some of the band hunted for game; others tilled the land—it was the familiar story of the pioneer in America.

Disease Took Its Toll.

The settlement of Salem from the first was of a religious character. The tenets of Puritanism were rigidly observed under the iron rule of Endicott, the first Governor, who suppressed the merriment of the young as a misdemeanor, and even went so far as to cut the red cross from the flag of England, the mother country.

It was a hard and long Winter for the band of worshipers and colonists, many of whom died of disease and insufficient food before the warm winds of Spring brought aid in the shape of a reinforcement of 400 immigrants. The danger of starvation over for the time being, the spiritual needs of the community received the dominant share of attention. After deliberation the Congregational creed was adopted and the new settlement was named Salem, a contraction of Jerusalem. The Church whose influence was to be all-powerful in molding the thought of New England for two centuries had been established.

Wrought out of logs and topped with a thatched roof, the first "meeting house" of Salem arose, a structure 20 by 17 feet, with rules and a decorum of its own. On one side sat the men, on the other the women and children. Armed with a long pole from which dangled a fox's tail, a constable watched the worshipers, stirring with his ticklish weapon those who fell into slumber. The Puritan spirit, strong in England and the new Colonies alike, had not yet reached the fervor that was to taint it with the superstitious persecution of innocent men and women.

Scholars have explained as a wave of hysteria the panic that seized upon Salem for six wild months in 1692 and sent twenty victims to ignominious death. The belief in witchcraft was firmly rooted in the credulous minds of the time, and only a hint was required to set it to growing into a deadly plant.

Witchcraft Shows Its Head.

As early as 1652 cases of "witchcraft" had been reported, and the penalty of whipping had been resorted to in order to quell what was regarded as "familiarity with the devil." The settlements of Rowley, Andover, Lynn, Marblehead and Salem, among others, had been stirred by strange occurrences. In extenuation of the procedure of the period it must be recalled that even such legal authorities as Blackstone and Bacon in the mother country had admitted the existence of witchcraft through their rules for the conduct of such cases. But it remained for Salem to bring the fear of witchcraft to heights theretofore unknown in the new land.

The actions of a group of "afflicted children" precipitated the frenzy that rode the settlement of Salem for a full half year. The names of Elizabeth

A Scene in the Early Days of Salem. Harper and Brothers

Parris and Abigail Williams, daughter and niece of the Rev. Samuel Parris, were the first of the children to exhibit strange antics and convulsions. They were questioned, and they wildly accused Tituba, a West Indian slave; bed-ridden Sarah Osburn, and Sarah Good, a woman of dubious reputation. The great Salem witch hunt was on from that moment.

One explanation of the phenomenon of the "afflicted children" is that they were in the habit of gathering for social parties at which fortune telling and magic were attempted, with the result that they became too expert in astonishing the community. At all events, their convulsions were spectacular enough, Ann Putnam even going so far as to experience hers in the middle of churchmeetings.

Innocent Folk Imprisoned.

When the three accused women were brought before the magistrates Tituba "confessed" that she had pinched and tormented the children, declaring that the devil had directed her to, and that Sarah Osburn and Sarah Good were her accomplices. Little more was needed to convince the frightened community. The three were promptly put in jail, where Sarah Osburn died. Tituba was sold.

Accusations of witchcraft were now made in all directions, and the jail in Prison Lane saw scores of innocent folk thrust into its portals to await trial. The case of Bridget Bishop, the first to be tried before the new court, was typical of the Salem delusion. Idle gossip and mere rumor were introduced as evidence and gravely listened to in case after case. It was taken for granted that any one accused of witchcraft was guilty and should pay the extreme penalty.

Cotton Mather, the eminent Boston divine, set down on paper the following remarkable circumstance connected with the haling of Bridget Bishop to trial:

"As this woman was, under a guard, passing by the great and spacious meeting house she gave a look toward the house and immediately a demon invisibly entering the meeting house tore down a part of it, so that though there was no person to be seen there, yet the people, at the noise, running in, found a board which was strongly fastened with several nails transported into another quarter of the house."

"Goody" Bishop's Accusers.

But this was a mild bit of description of the activities of "Goody" Bishop, whose case indicated to other unfortunates what species of testimony they might expect to be confronted with. A boy named Cook testified that "about five or six years ago one morning before sun rising as I was in bed before I rose I saw good wife Bishop stand in the chamber by the window, and she looked on me and grinned on me and presently struck me on the side of the head, which did very much hurt me; and then I saw her go out under the end window at a little crevice, about so big as I could thrust my hand into."

A servant, John Louder, contributed his share by declaring that "going to bed about the dead of night I felt a great weight upon my breast, and awakening, looked, and it being bright moonlight, did clearly see Bridget Bishop, or her likeness, sitting upon my stomach, and, putting my arms off the bed to free myself from the great oppression, she presently laid hold of my throat, and almost choked me, and I had no strength or power in my hands to resist or help myself; and in this condition she held me to almost day."

Workmen who had been engaged in removing the cellar wall in the house where Bridget Bishop lived testified that they had found "several puppets made up of rags and and hogs' bristles with headless pins in them, with the points outward." There was other testimony of the same absurd character and it was enough. Bridget Bishop was sentenced to death as a witch and was executed within a week. The original death warrant, the only one preserved from the "witchcraft delusion" period, has been hung in the office of the Clerk of the Courts at Salem.

Sarah Good, Sarah Wilder, Elizabeth How, Susanna Martin and Rebecca Nurse were sentenced next and duly taken to Gallows Hill. By the middle of the tragic Summer of 1692 the witch fever of Salem was at the height of its devastation. It had become a case of denounce or be denounced. From the mass of accusations made against persons even of unblemished reputation, it seems obvious that an ideal way had been discovered in which the unscrupulous could pay off old grudges against their neighbors.

Even death by torture was resorted to by the Court in one harrowing instance. Eighty-one-year-old Giles Corey had been arrested on the popular accusation. His was the strongest of Puritan persistence, a persistence that amounted in the end to real heroism. His own wife had been executed as a witch; he himself, when brought to trial, flatly refused to open his mouth throughout the proceedings.

He would not confess to a league with the devil of which he was innocent; he would not even recognize the charge against him by pleading not guilty. He sat as silent as a stone while sentence was pronounced. In a vain effort to make him speak he was taken to a field where a great weighted board was pressed down upon him. He only asked that the weight might be made heavier so that he could die beneath it sooner. No other word came from him.

Common Sense Restored.

In September the court of witchcraft adjourned, never to be convened again. It had cost no less than twenty lives. The heroism of Corey had gone far toward restoring the common sense of the community. In addition, accusations were brought against men and women so high in public esteem that it was impossible even for ignorant minds to credit them with evil doing. It was actually hinted that the wife of the Governor was about to be charged with witchcraft. The delusion died and hundreds of the accused were released from prison. Thus ended New England's blackest chapter.

The Revolution found the old Puritan zeal busy in new channels. Salem claims the honor of making the first armed resistance to the British in America. At the North Bridge, on Feb. 26, 1775, the men of Salem defied a British force under Colonel Leslie to advance further in its search for hidden cannon and the invaders retreated.

Salem lay on the seacoast and the hardihood of its seafaring men was known throughout the Colonies. Privateers were urgently needed to harry British shipping in the troubled years that followed. Of these swift and daring vessels Salem sent no less than 158 into Continental service. That was the beginning of Salem's great period of trading at sea. The little port dispatched its vessels over all the world.

Salem Ships and Sailors.

A Salem clipper ship brought the first cargo ever carried in an American bottom direct from Canton to New England. The wealth of China, of all the Orient, was borne home by Salem's sons. They were the men who manned the clippers, starting out as cabin boys and receiving captains' commissions at 20. By the age of 40 the typical weather-beaten Salem skipper had retired with a fortune to build himself a huge mansion filled with the treasure trove of his voyagings. The Cleopatra's Barge of George Crowninshield, which sailed through the Mediterranean in 1816, is said to be the first American pleasure yacht to visit Europe.

Still other honors fell to the New England town when it became the birthplace of the American novelist who made the ancient days of the Puritans live again with compelling truth. Nathaniel Hawthorne was born in Salem and dwelt in half a dozen of its houses, all of them associated with the marvelous chronicles which flowed from his pen. He was Surveyor of the Port when he wrote the immortal "Scarlet Letter," delving for his material into the musty records of the quaint streets and houses around him.

In all that is of interest historically Salem has long been one of the cities of America that treasures a full and vivid past. The rush and clangor of modernity may invade its streets today; its white-sailed, venturesome clipper ships may be gone, but still the traditions remain to make the observance of its three hundredth year of pulsing life an important event to the country at large.

OBSERVANCE OF MOTHERS' DAY DATES BACK MANY CENTURIES

ALTHOUGH the formal designation of a specific day as Mother's Day was but recently made in this country, the custom of displaying filial veneration dates back to ancient times. It antedates the Christian era, was displayed in rites and ceremonies in pagan days and strikes deep into primitive emotions.

Authorities state that perhaps the earliest recorded formal mother worship lies in the tales of the ceremonies by which Rhea, the "great mother of the gods," was worshiped in Asia Minor. In this worship it was not so much the tender maternal aspect which claimed attention as the power and majesty of motherhood. Rhea was represented as traversing the mountains in a chariot drawn by lions, and the ceremonies in her honor were marked by wild dances and wilder music. The lion, the oak and the pine were sacred to her.

The worship of Rhea was introduced into Rome through Greece about 250 years before Christ. Ceremonies were held on the Ides of March, when people made offerings in the temple, and mid-Lent Sunday for the faithful to visit the churches in which they were baptized, bearing gifts for the altar.

From this festival of worship in honor of the Mother Church there grew the observance of Mothering Sunday, though the successive steps in this development are not clear. It is certain, however, that long ago, when young men and maidens were bound out as apprentices and as servants, mid-Lent Sunday was set aside for them to visit their mothers, taking for them some little present, such as a cake or trinket. A youth engaged in such a pilgrimage was said to go a-mothering, from which the day came to be called Mothering Sunday.

It is a far cry from this quaint observance in England of mid-Lent to our American Mother's Day. There is no unbroken line of descent to the present observance from the holiday when English apprentices went a-mothering, though the modern festival is perhaps the most conscious and deliberate effort a nation ever made to honor motherhood.

GREAT BUDDHA'S CALM UNSHAKEN BY QUAKES

UNTOUCHED by recent earthquakes, typhoons or tidal waves, in the midst of a hilly temple garden at Kamakura, Japan, the great bronze Buddha sits in tranquil majesty, contemplating. The calm of his face symbolizes the spirit of Buddhism.

Kamakura, near Yokohama, was in former times a residence of the Shogun or military ruler. Now it is a favorite seaside resort for American tourists and Russian emigres, and a Mecca for native pilgrims who come to worship at the shrine of Amida Butsu, Lord of Light. Twice has a temple been built to shelter the image and twice has it been destroyed by fire or tidal wave.

The colossal image of Buddha is

CHILD LABORERS FLOOD SHANGHAI

American and British Civic Societies Join to Help Them—Some Are Only 6 Years Old—Twelve-Hour Day in Force

BRITISH and American civic and business organizations are engaged in a campaign against the child labor evils in Shanghai factories and mills, backing up the report of the Shanghai Municipal Council's Commission on Child Labor that "these children are frequently most miserably housed and fed. They receive no money and their conditions of life are practically those of slavery." More than 22,000 Chinese children under 12 years of age have been farmed out to toil twelve hours a day for contractors, with whom the children's parents divide the profits.

The directors of the China Society of America, with national headquarters at 19 West Forty-fourth Street, have been moved to suggest that its members "having representatives at Shanghai, be asked to cable such representatives urging them to attend the ratepayers' meeting and give careful consideration to the question."

They are acting in advance of the annual meeting of the taxpayers there, to be held this month, at which it is hoped the reforms proposed by the Child Labor Commission will be favorably endorsed and put into operation. The matter has been pending two years. The conditions complained of are reported to be as bad as ever. Last year the required number of taxpayers resident in Shanghai did not attend the annual meeting. This year, however, so many groups are busy in the British Isles and the United States that action is confidently expected.

Major Gen. James G. Harbord, President of the Radio Corporation of America, is President of the China Society of America and the honorary President is W. Cameron Forbes, former Governor General of the Philippine Islands. Both men have a personal knowledge of conditions in Shanghai by reason of their long residence in the Orient.

British Urge Reforms.

An editorial in a late issue of The Manchester Guardian called the report of the Child Labor Commission "one of the most melancholy social documents of recent years." The situation also has been called a "system of industry harnessed to conditions that existed in England 100 years ago."

Recently the China and Far Eastern section of the Manchester Chamber of Commerce sent the following cable to the British Chamber of Commerce in Shanghai:

"Our China executive, having carefully considered report, hope you will be able very strongly to urge the council to adopt at an early date their commission's recommendations."

Pressure upon Shanghai interests has already been brought to bear from other British sources. The factory problem in China and the responsibility therefor of foreigners and Chinese alike has been set forth in London, Glasgow, Manchester and other cities. Among the groups taking similar action in this country have been several Rotary Clubs.

The foreign factories have strong financial backing from wealthy Chinese, and in many Chinese-controlled or Chinese-owned plants conditions are no better than in the foreign establishments.

The Chairman of the Shanghai commission was a British lawyer. One-half of the members represented manufacturers, all males, and all the others were Chinese and foreign women of the Joint Committee of Women's Clubs. They were advised by Dame Adelaide Anderson, formerly Chief Woman Factory Inspector of Great Britain. They found that there were 22,440 Chinese children under 12 years old at work in the mills. The child employes over that age numbered 50,702.

Children of Six Work.

"The commencement age varies with the nature of the employment," says the report. "But it can be asserted that, generally speaking, the child begins to work in the mill or factory as soon as it is of any economic value to the employer. The commission has visited a number of mills during the day and night, and has seen very many children at work who could not have been more than 6 years of age.

"The hours of work are generally twelve, with not more than one hour off for a meal. The children frequently have to stand the whole time they are at work. In many industries day and night work is the rule, there being two shifts of twelve hours each.

"In most instances the mill or factory stops for one shift at week-ends, and in others, in addition to this, endeavors are made by the employers, but without much success, to insure that their work people take one day off from work every two weeks. Apart from interruptions and the customary holidays at China's New Year, work is continuous.

"Wages are paid only for working days. In many cases the atmospheric and dust conditions are bad. The sanitary arrangements in the majority of mills and factories leave very much to be desired. The average earnings of a child are usually not more than twenty silver cents a day—10 cents in American money.

Children Virtually Slaves.

"The contract system of employment is common. Under this system the native contractor supplies the requisite labor and is paid on production. This system is obviously open to grave abuse. The commission heard evidence to the effect that in some instances contractors obtain young children from the country districts, paying the parents $2 a month ($1 United States currency) for the services of each child. By employing such children in the mills and factories the contractor is able to make a profit of about $4 a month ($2 United States currency) in respect of each child.

"These children are frequently most miserably housed and fed. They receive no money and their conditions of life are practically those of slavery."

The commission found that there were 274 factories in the Foreign Settlement and the native districts of Chapel and Pootung. The establishments pertained to almost every kind of industry.

In view of the delicate state of political affairs in Shanghai, the commission's recommendations, given below, are considered quite mild:

To prohibit the employment of children under 10 years of age, raising the minimum to twelve in four years.

To prohibit the employment of children under 14 years of age for a longer period than twelve hours.

Twenty-four hours of continuous rest in at least every fourteen days for children under 14.

To prohibit the employment of children under 14 in factories where especially dangerous conditions exist.

The Shanghai Municipal Council is composed of foreign property owners, and there are no Chinese members, although the Chinese pay a large part of the taxes. Nevertheless, the report points ou that:

"Reform of present industrial conditions and the consequent amelioration of the lot of the Chinese child worker cannot be achieved unless it receives the moral and active support not only of the foreign residents, but of the vastly greater body of the Chinese public."

LUPIN, RENAMED BLUEBONNET, IS THE STATE FLOWER OF TEXAS

YEARLY in Texas the bluebonnet contributes to the beauty of America. It blossoms in the early Spring, and nothing is more charming to the nature lover than bluebonnet fields of undulating blue, deep, soft blue—in the midst of them a scattering of orange flowers that make the bluebonnets seem ever lovelier.

Lupinus subcornosus, tevensis, buffalo clover, wolf flower, blue lupin and el conejo are some of the strange names that this flower has been called. Behind each name is a story, true or false, but of interest not only to the botanist but to those interested in the history of our continent.

Botanists formerly knew the flower as lupinus subcornosus, but when it was adopted as the State flower in March, 1901, the Texas Legislature gave it the legal name of bluebonnet. Then the botanists, who do not indulge in simple names, called it Texensis. The layman, however, used the State name of bluebonnet.

Fifty to a hundred years ago the flower was known as buffalo clover and was so called because the buffaloes were supposed to eat the succulent foliage that appeared each March. Cattle have no taste for bluebonnet—its alkaloid properties give them cirrhosis of the liver—but sheep and goats are said to like it.

The name wolf flower was a libel on the bluebonnet. This term (derived by translation from lupin, which comes from lupus, or wolf) was applied by early settlers, and they believed the reason was that the bluebonnet robbed the soil of its fertility, which needs plenty of space.

Translated literally from the Spanish the word el conejo means rabbit. But in this case it is supposed to mean cotton-tail rabbit. The name is applied to the bluebonnet because of a whimsical resemblance that the Mexicans see between the bloom cluster and the upturned white-tipped tale of a scurrying cotton-tail. For the top of the bluebonnet cluster, being made up of buds, is a pale blue and shows practically white.

The name bluebonnet is due to the shape of each individual flower; each is a perfectly formed little blue bonnet that seems to shade a lovely face.

Many legends are connected with the bluebonnet and how it first came to Texas. Some of them are told by J. Frank Doble in "Legends of Texas." The Mexican and Indian stories relate that the bluebonnet bloomed on the soil because of the sacrifice of a little Indian girl's life that her people might be saved from drought and pestilence.

Spanish folklore records that when the priests first came to Texas they brought with them the seeds of a blue flower that had grown on the hillsides around Jerusalem. They planted them first outside the mission walls. Later the seeds were scattered far and wide by the winds. In the Eastern United States the lupinus with a blue to white flower is sometimes called sun dial, from the way its leaves turn toward the sun.

Raymond Whitcomb CRUISES by LAND & SEA

All continents, including Australia and Europe

Japan, China, Philippines, Java, India, Egypt, etc. Rates cover more than 40 Shore Excursions, including such essential points as Peking, Delhi, Agra, Benares, Cairo, etc. — and for the first time includes historic Seoul (capital of Korea), the Great Chinese Wall, the magnificent New Zealand Fjord Country.

Rates ($2250 & up) include over 40 shore excursions.

LAND CRUISES

Sailing June to September

Ocean comfort on a cruise across America

The Land Cruise liners have rooms with private baths, showers, beds instead of berths, wardrobes, dressing-tables — gymnasiums, movies, dance- and lecture-rooms, barber and manicure shops, lounges — these ultra-modern cruising trains were especially designed by Pullman for Raymond-Whitcomb.

Scenery by day—nights at noted hotels

Cruise-routes include California, National Parks, Alaska, Canadian Rockies, etc., exploring Indian pueblos, stone forests, gold countries, cowboy lands, a places of traditional greatness and places of intense interest heretofore almost inaccessible to the average traveler. Rates include many automobile trips and nights spent "ashore".

First cruise sails June 1. Rates from New York.

MIDNIGHT SUN CRUISE

The S. S. "Carinthia" sails June 29 to Iceland, fjords of Norway, Norwegian towns, Oslo, Copenhagen, Amsterdam, Boulogne and Southampton . . . . when schools and colleges are closed and the weather hot . . . . the ideal vacation cruise.

Moderate rates on a Luxury Ship

SS. George Washington

STAND down at the Battery some day and watch the George Washington coming up the Bay. Three thousand miles of Atlantic behind her and looking as if she had just been launched. Nearly 24,000 gross tons and moving like a yacht.

People who sail on this ship again and again are mostly those who like to travel fast without ever seeming to, who like refined not gaudy surroundings, and ones who are critical of cookery and too experienced to take chances when it comes to long distance travel.

On the George Washington, smoothly running elevators supplement beautiful stairways. Wherever possible, Colonial windows replace portholes. There are promenade decks, smoking rooms, lounges, barber shops and a gymnasium.

RATES are most reasonable. First class from $231; second from $136.25 and Tourist III from $97.50.

The next three sailings of the S. S. George Washington to Plymouth, Cherbourg and Bremen are May 12, June 9, July 7.

In view of the big summer rush, reservations should be made as soon as possible.

Under the Stars and Stripes

BESIDES the George Washington, the United States Lines operate the Leviathan, most famous ship in the world, the Republic, the famous cruise ship, the President Harding and President Roosevelt, the fastest Cabin ships on the Atlantic.

Frequent sailings—on fine Canadian Pacific steamships—to Liverpool, Southampton, Belfast, Cobh, Glasgow, Cherbourg, Antwerp or Hamburg. "Empress" steamships from Quebec. THE POETS' CORNER OF ENGLAND

THE ENGLISH POETS loved the English Lakes.

They wove the peaceful loveliness of lake and fell into gentle verse and left it as a legacy to the English-speaking world. Wordsworth, Southey, Coleridge: here in the Lake District is the beauty that inspired their muse. To visit this region is to understand their work—to share their inspiration.

Travel to the Lakes from Euston by the famous West Coast Route of the London Midland and Scottish Railway. It carries you across the broad acres of rural England, through busy, bustling Lancashire to climb the steep face of Shap and gain the garden of the English Lakes.

Fast comfortable trains with restaurant cars and sleeping cars attached serve the Lake District.

MANY FARMS LIE AT DOOR OF CITY

Large Profits Made by Long Islanders Who Practice Intensive Gardening on Small Plots —Whole Families Work in the Fields

PUBLICISTS, economists and especially politicians with vital interest in the distribution of the country's voting strength, have taken recently to "viewing with alarm" the tendency of American farm-bred youth to follow the rainbow to urban stores, offices and factories in search of the mythical pot of gold. But still the soil is tilled and foodstuffs are produced in abundance for the other folk included in the 117,000,000 population.

It is a reasonable assumption that the farm will continue to hold its place at the apex of the statistical column showing the country's production of wealth. Men work on farms for money and right on New York City's borders men are making more profit out of farms for capital invested and labor expended than they could make in a white-collar job in the heart of the metropolis or could earn in a dusty factory.

But this farming within commuting distance of the metropolis, and even within the limits of the city itself, is not farming of the kind practiced in the wide West; it is truck farming, market gardening. In Suffolk County, L. I., alone, 170,000 acres are given over to market gardening. The land is roughly valued at $45,000,000 and the value of the crop taken from it annually is estimated at $17,000,000. Kings County, across the East River from Manhattan, has thirty farms under cultivation and Queens County has 450 enclosures where market gardening is conducted with profit. The Queens farms take in 9,000 acres valued at more than $35,000,000, and the annual crop yield is $3,500,000. Nassau County, the next political division to the East, has 45,000 acres in 900 farms valued at $60,000,000. Nassau sells more than $8,000,000 worth of fresh vegetables to New York City every year.

Long Island's Secret.

These figures have behind them the authority of H. B. Fullerton of Medford, L. I., whose research and experimental work over a period of thirty years has shown to the Long Island truck farmer the way to bigger, more diversified and more profitable crops. Mr. Fullerton, who opened the eyes of Theodore Roosevelt to the agricultural possibilities of Long Island, holds decided opinions on the superiority of the Island as the nation's garden spot. He says:

"From 1637 to date, Long Island farmers have never lost a crop. Why? Because this island is the only considerable piece of land in the United States lying east and west. Here the prevailing wind in the Summer is from the southwest. It has traveled over land and is thoroughly dried out by the time it reaches the Atlantic seaboard. Then it blows over the ocean, becoming saturated with moisture, and on striking the island it deposits this precious moisture where it does incalculable good. The annual rainfall is between forty-eight and fifty-two inches. As it is distributed throughout the year the growth of plant life is never checked. On a morning after a hot day I have pulled up a cabbage and found moisture dripping from the roots."

Mr. Fullerton tells of a "passage at arms" between a visitor from the western part of the United States and an Italian Long Island market gardener. The visitor was in search of a plot of ground suitable for farming. He stopped his automobile and called to the gardener who was picking tomatoes.

$1,500 Yield Per Acre.

"Nice place you've got," said he.

"Uh-up, y-e-a-s."

"Like to sell it?"

"No; I busy."

"Give you $300 an acre."

"No; I busy," and he picked another tomato.

"Give you $400 an acre—$500."

"No."

"Why, you're crazy, man. You've got nothing but a light loam, and mighty little of that. It's not farming land. Give you $600 an acre."

"No; I busy."

Then the Westerner offered $1,000 an acre for the land.

"I busy," calmly replied the gardener, resuming his tomato picking.

"Man, man, you don't mean to say you wouldn't sell for $1,000 an acre?"

"For why I sell?" asked the Italian. "Las' year me make $1,500 d' acre on peppers. I busy. Good day."

And thus it is all over the eastern counties of the island. Market gardens under intensive farming, such as is practiced in France, Germany and Italy, are clearing between $500 and $600 an acre, and even more, it is asserted. Crops are rotated, four crops being at times picked in a year. And then there is the chicken plant adjunct, which yields handsomely in eggs, broilers and roasting fowl. It is not uncommon to see a foreign-born gardener, or one of his American-born children trained to his methods, pick lettuce and then reach into his pocket and drop early cabbage seed into the place where the lettuce stood.

Several Crops a Year.

No time is lost; no ground is wasted. These market gardeners plow right up to the public road, driving their horse, or tractors out into the highway in making a turn. On the Long Island truck farm, more than perhaps in any other place in the United States, there is extreme close cultivation and the careful nursing of crops characteristic of old-country farming. The principal crops, all of which go to New York, are potatoes, tomatoes, cauliflower, lettuce, beans, peas and melons. Three hundred varieties of vegetables and fruits are grown on the island. Alfalfa, timothy, clover, corn and other fodder crops are raised, mainly for the home cattle.

Lettuce matures early. It is a sixty-day crop. Along with the lettuce is planted what is known as a catch crop of radishes. Before all the lettuce is picked early cabbage or a quick-maturing sweet corn like Golden Bantam, an eighty-five-day crop, may be put in as space is found, to be followed in turn by late cabbage and turnips. This, of course, is not the regular schedule. Some gardeners go in heavily for potatoes, tomatoes, beans or other profitable vegetables, but invariably the ground is replanted as soon as one crop is harvested.

Perhaps the best known garden product of the island is cauliflower. Nowhere else in the world, it is said, does this vegetable reach nearer to perfection than here. Its introduction to the island grower was due to chance, although it is likely that so delicious a vegetable would in course of time have made its way across the ocean in more orthodox manner.

Cauliflower an Immigrant.

A native Long Island gardener on a visit to Europe saw cauliflower for the first time in his life. He grew enthusiastic over it and sent some seeds to a friend back home in Southold, Southold, incidentally, disputes with Southampton for the distinction of being the oldest settlement on the island. Both date back to 1634. One was settled in July, the other in August. Which came first is a question depending largely upon whether your informant hails from Southold or from Southampton. The Southold gardener planted his seed. The plants came up and grew to magnificent maturity. But now that he had them what should he do with them? He bethought him of his friend in New York, Delmonico, the restaurant man. This was the elder Delmonico, who knew all about almost everything that could be cooked.

Delmonico, it is related, opened his eyes in wonder when he saw the cauliflower. It was the first he had seen in America. He expatiated excitedly on the vegetable's value for the table and before long cauliflower appeared upon the Delmonico bill of fare. But once the crop was gathered, the Long Islander searched in vain for seeds for the next year's planting. He did not learn until later that the plant seeds the second year. He sent to Europe and got more seed and thereafter was supplied by his own stock.

At first it was believed that cauliflower would grow only on Long Island and in certain European countries, notably Denmark. Now it is raised all over the United States. It is said to grow best, however, on Long Island and in Oregon, parts of which have light, loamy soil.

Long Island market gardeners are popularly supposed to be mostly foreign born. Aside from the native Long Islanders, the first to appreciate the gardening possibilities of the island were not immigrants from Europe but farmers from Missouri and Nebraska. They saw chances of profit in the constant and growing demands of a city the size of New York—a market so near that freight rates were a negligible factor. They bought up pine barrens and scrub oak land for as low as a dollar an acre. It was for bidding land from a farmer's standpoint, but as Mr. Fullerton demonstrated later, where nature grows oak she will grow almost anything if her methods of fertilization are followed and accelerated by the resources of man.

After the Far Westerners came a few Virginians and some from Ohio. Then immigrants from Holland and France, men of market-gardening blood, and from Germany, took up land on the island. In 1906 what are roughly and incorrectly termed "Polacks" made their appearance. The so-called "Polacks" are Lithuanians, Ukrainians and other Slavs. In the last ten years these have been augmented by numbers of Italians, Bohemians and Hungarians. All are farmers, close-cultivating hard-working gardeners whose wives and children do a full share of the field labor. Everybody in these families works, including father, who knows no quitting hour so long as he can see to grub in the ground.

Many of these gardeners speak English after a fashion; all their children speak English, or rather American, and are among the best students in the country schools. The rapidity with which such a family takes root and blossoms into full American citizenship with all that it implies is illustrated by the story of a Hungarian family.

First came the father. He had enough money to buy ten acres of scrub oak land—land which a few years ago an American would scorn to own. Taking a leaf from the book of the Sage of Medford, he cleared the land with dynamite—that is, he blew out all the considerable trees and stumps. Then he grubbed out the shrubs and the pestiferous huckleberry and other tangled root growths. When the furniture came it was too large, or the door was too small, and the furniture had to be taken apart before it could be carried inside. He was a good market gardener but a poor house builder.

After planting and harvesting two crops he was ready to send for his family. The family came over in the steerage—the wife and mother and two daughters. In the meantime Mr. Hungarian had built what he called a house. But so little did he know of houses on the American plan that he forgot to put in a single window, and the flimsy roof would not shed water.

Then the entire family pitched in and worked in the garden. Gradually the girls observed in neighboring houses what the father had failed to see—ways in which their home could be improved. Their suggestions were acted on. Eventually the house was made a comfortable living place.

This all began only fifteen years ago. Today one of the girls is attending high school; the other, after two years in high school, is a stenographer for a large island real estate firm. And the old house disappeared some four years ago. The family now lives in a modern two-story Queen Anne cottage. The girls of this family are as thoroughly American as any of their former school associates.

A peculiarity of the island farm industry is that the percentage of tenant farmers is low except in Kings and Queens, where many of the gardeners are renters, some of them without even a definite leasehold. In Suffolk, the largest market-gardening county, the tenant farmers are estimated to number not over 10 per cent. of the total. What is more important, the Suffolk tenant farmer usually becomes a farm owner within a year or two after harvesting his first crop. On the eastern end of the Island much new land is being cleared and old abandoned farms are being taken up and brought back into food-producing gardens.

PROHIBITION BATTLE ENGROSSES CAPITAL

Outstanding Scenes and Figures at Hearing—The House Begins Its Own Investigation Tomorrow

Women's Day at the Investigation—Mrs. Henry W. Peabody Is in the Witness Chair.

By L. C. SPEERS.

WASHINGTON.

PROHIBITION, for and against, holds the stage in Washington today. In Congress and in all the great Government departments, it is the all-absorbing topic of comment and debate. Regardless of the result of the present inquiry there is no doubt whatever that it is to be an even more debated topic in the next Congress, elected in November. What is true of official Washington is just as true of the greater part, which is unofficial. No matter where one goes—hotel lobbies, on the cars, in the restaurants, on the street corners, and even in the busiest of the stores when you hear people talking—it is a 2 to 1 wager that prohibition is the subject under discussion.

One day there comes from the "White House spokesman" the statement that prohibition is the law and must be enforced, no matter how unpopular it may be with millions of the electorate. Again, Attorney General Sargent, who seldom talks or speaks for publication, issues a ringing defiance to all the wets and everything they are battling for. And no sooner is that in print than some public official, like General Lincoln C. Andrews, head of the Prohibition Enforcement Unit, or Emory R. Buckner United States Attorney for the Southern District of New York, says something that sounds friendly to the modificationists they are at once made the target of the always busy sharpshooters of the powerful bone dry organizations, in the forefront of which stands Wayne B. Wheeler and the Anti-Saloon League, of which he is counsel.

Interest in the wet and dry issue just at this moment is centred on the hearings now being conducted by the Senate Committee on Judiciary—an inquiry that has developed into the biggest prohibition "show down," staged on or off the floors of Congress since the Eighteenth Amendment was ratified by the States.

House Starts Own Inquiry.

But apparently the Senate investigation, big as it is and broad as is its scope, is not enough; and so the House of Representatives, through its own Alcoholic Liquor Traffic Committee, has decided, beginning tomorrow, to hold hearings of its own, in an effort to arrive at some sort of a conclusion as to just what the prohibition situation in the United States now is.

As for the interest of the public in the proceedings before the Judiciary Committee of the Senate, there can be no two opinions. All that is necessary to convince a doubting Thomas is for that person to try to squeeze into the big committee room of the Senate Office Building where the wets and the drys are waging a war of words as bitter as any Washington has known in a generation.

The wets who, with the single exception of last Monday, which was given over to the women of the National La.. Enforcement Committee, fired their salvos most of last week and the week before, while the drys, marshaled by Wayne Wheeler, the Rev. Dr. Clarence True Wilson, the Rev. Dr. S. Parkes Cadman, Bishop James Cannon Jr. of the Methodist Episcopal Church, Mrs. Ella Boole, President of the Women's Christian Temperance Union, and a host of other men and women prominent in the rank and file of the dry army, were digging in and getting their machine guns placed for the effort to prove untrue everything the wets assert they have proved.

But the battle, as the columns of every newspaper in the United States proves, is no longer confined to the committee rooms of the Senate and the House. It is being waged just as bitterly on the floors of the two Houses, where every day the leaders of the contending forces manage, no matter what the issue before them, to get in a broadside or two for their causes.

In the Senate, McKellar of Tennessee, Sheppard of Texas, author of the Eighteenth Amendment, and Willis of Ohio, are always on the alert, for to them there is no bigger word in the English language than dry, when used in connection with beverages of more than one-half of 1 per cent. alcoholic content. And it makes no difference whether these beverages be the lightest of wines, the purest of beers, the best of Bourbon whiskies, or just common ordinary "white mule," synthetic gin or American made Scotch.

Joined Camp of Drys.

Senator Borah has apparently forgotten the League of Nations for the time being, and has joined the camp of the drys. He was always for prohibition, although it was generally understood that there are some features of it over which he cannot be enthusiastic. Now, however, he is one of the champion dry stokers, and even Willis or Sheppard cannot shovel more dry fuel into the furnaces than can the man from Idaho.

Then, of course, there is that ever busy wet quintet, Senators Bruce of Maryland, "Jim" Reed, Missouri; Edge and Edwards of New Jersey, and Broussard, who comes from Louisiana—the State in which is the city that made the Zarac cocktail famous. Even the drys have to admit that the wet commanders in the Senate can hold their own, no matter who is commanding for the drys.

As for the House of Representatives, the drys in that end of the Capitol are even busier, if such a thing be possible. The arid brothers of the House eat, sleep and drink prohibition. There is Upshaw of Georgia, who used to be an Anti-saloon League orator before he entered politics; Crampton of Michigan; and a host of others from every part of the Union. And the Busy Bee has nothing on any of them, even though it happens that both Speaker Longworth and Finis Garret, the Democratic leader, are not in the dry "Who's Who."

Wets Have a Hard Time.

The wets in the House have a harder time, because of the rules, than do their brothers in the upper chamber. But they nevertheless make the best of their opportunities and every time a dry goes up a tree to do a little sniping it is a foregone conclusion that somebody in the New York or New Jersey delegations, perhaps Mr. Vare, who wants to take Mr. Pepper's place in the Senate, or Tinkham or Gallivan of Massachusetts, or the irrepressible Hill of Maryland, will find some vantage point from which to return the fire of the prohibition sharpshooter.

There are in both houses a dozen or more propositions pending, including modification of the law to permit light wines and beers and the outright repeal of the law or even of the whole Eighteenth Amendment. If none of these can be reported out of committee—and as matters now stand it looks that way—then a referendum to the people themselves to let them say with ballots just what they think about prohibition as now practiced in the United States, is proposed.

These various propositions are supposedly the basis of the great "dry and wet" combat now being waged before the Judiciary Committee of the Senate, admittedly the most important and far reaching inquiry into the liquor problem yet authorized by either branch of Congress.

The Gavel Is Banged.

The picture of the hearing is one not soon forgotten by those who are so lucky as to be on hand when Senator Walsh, the "Teapot Dome" prosecutor, bangs his gavel for order. Never more than a third of those who seek admittance to the big room in the Senate Office Building, where wets and drys do verbal battle, are able to squeeze in. There is no middle ground. The wets never cheer the drys, and the drys never, by even so much as a smile, endorse anything the wets have to say. Germany and France were in 1914 just about as politically friendly as are the two groups of men and women who are arguing the liquor problem in Washington.

The doors swing open at 9:45 and immediately the vanguard, scores of whom have been in line for an hour or more, make a rush for seats. It is a case of first come, first served. The rule is no favoritism. The humblest in Washington gets the best seat, provided he is at the head of the long line. In five minutes every seat has its occupant and the "standee" part of the room is packed. The doors close, the unlucky vent their disappointment, but they don't go away. Most of them remain to the last, hoping an unexpected exodus may make it possible for them to enter.

Camera men are present in force. Since the first day, however, they have not been permitted to operate inside the room, but it is another story in the corridors where the boom of the flashlights is the signal that the committee is in sight. The day the Women's National Law Enforcement Committee descended on the Senate committee the explosions were so many and so noisy that Senator Reed, the "big hope" of the wets, remarked that it sounded like the "Battle of the Marne."

Wayne B. Wheeler, Chief Counsel of the Anti-Saloon League

Because of the illness of Senator Means of Colorado, Walsh of Montana is the acting Chairman of the committee, and as a rule he enters the room first. Everybody in Washington knows the man from the Mountain State—very slender, solemn of face, quick in walk and speech, and dry to the very bone. The dry contingent smile their happiest as Walsh works his way through the crowd to his seat behind the committee table.

Another figure appears. He is tall, as straight as a Sioux warrior, gray haired, clean shaven and even his enemies admit he is distinguished in appearance. He sinks into his seat, taps the table, sometimes with his pencil. His attitude is that of a man ready for a scrap. Of course, this is "Jim" Reed, the fiery senior Senator from Missouri, the only wet on the committee, but who is, says the wet spokesman, a committee all in himself. More about him later.

Next a bald-headed, full-faced ruddy man. He is Guy Despard Goff, Senator from West Virginia, who recently introduced in the Senate the bill to grant enforcement officers the right to enter homes in search for forbidden beverages. He seldom asks a question. He just sits and listens. Like Walsh he has a niche in the heart of every dry in the room, for, like his Montana colleague, he is as dry as a piece of North Carolina pine.

Senator Means, not being in the picture, just one more Senator remains unaccounted for. He is tall and gray-haired. A Kentuckian by birth and a Senator from Oklahoma. He is listed "bone dry" and he asks many questions interpreted by many as being "just a wee bit wet," but he generally manages to neutralize any possible wet enthusiasm by asking some question that is as dry as any Morris Sheppard, author of the Eighteenth Amendment, or Wayne B. Wheeler, could possibly frame.

Now the committee is complete. The room is jammed to capacity. In the front row of the public reservation are, as a rule, two persons who are commanding figures in every dry assemblage held in the United States. Th are the "big guns" of the non-office-holding element in the prohibition army.

Wayne Bidwell Wheeler.

It's a hundred-to-one wager that there is not a dry in the United States who cannot guess the name of one of them. He is Wayne Bidwell Wheeler, general counsel of the Anti-Saloon League of America, the man who is credited with drafting most of the important sections of the law that bears the name of Andrew J. Volstead of Minnesota. Mr. Wheeler has a tiny gray mustache; his complexion is pale. He is commander-in-chief of the dry army and is ever on the alert. He insists these hearings mean nothing whatever in so far as wet legislation is concerned, but he is willing, he adds, to let the wets have their say on the apparent theory that "it won't do them any good and won't hurt anybody else."

The second member of the trio is Bishop James Cannon Jr. of Richmond, Va., like Wheeler, another physically frail figure, at least in appearance. He looks as solemn as Senator Walsh. He writes many notes—perhaps instructions to the subordinate dry commanders. He is one of the powerful figures of the Anti-Saloon League.

Two Women Dry Leaders.

In other parts of the room are other national figures of the dry movement. For instance, there is Mrs. Henry W. Peabody of Beverly, Mass., who is alway smiling and at the same time ready to argue the "great cause" even though she be pitted against the great wet cross-examiner from Kansas City. Also present is Mrs. Ella Boole of New York City, President of the National Women's Christian Temperance Union.

They are both matronly in appearance and they know every woman dry in the room. There will never be any 2.75 per cent. beer or light wines if they have their way. Their motto is: "Don't weaken, but make the Volstead law even more rigid than is now the case."

Some days there is also present William D. Upshaw of Georgia, who is often referred to as the champion dry of the House of Representatives. Whenever a dry witness makes what he thinks is a good point the Georgian rubs his hands together gleefully and murmurs "Fine!" or "Good!" just as people used to say "Amen!" in the old days of the camp meetings.

Then again attention is sometimes attracted to a woman who, the other day, gave the committee to understand that what New Jersey needs is a new pair of United States Senators and a new Governor instead of the wet trio, who, she explained, are now in the saddle. Incidentally she gave Senator Reed to understand that she thought it would be a fine thing if Mr. Hague, the Democratic chieftain of Hudson County, was dethroned.

"You don't mean 'Haig and Haig' do you?" questioned Senator Reed.

"I do not," replied the woman dry leader of Camden, who happens to also be a member of the New Jersey Republican State Committee.

These are just a few of the drys who are on hand to see that the wets are routed.

Now for the wets. Like the drys their number is legion. Most of them are either able lawyers or experienced political leaders. No one in attendance on the hearings can deny that they know their side of the case. At the head of this group are seven men, all members of Congress four of them Senators and three members of the House.

An Able Presentation.

The wet legislators mobilize in the back of the room just behind the committee table. One of them is William Cabell Bruce, junior Senator from Maryland; he fired the first gun for the wets. Senator Reed said afterward it was the ablest presentation of the wet case yet offered by any man in or out of public life. Bruce speaks in machine-gun fashion. He does not mince words, but calls a spade a spade.

Prohibition, in Senator Bruce's opinion, and he is considered a scholar in public office, is nothing less than a blight, a breeder of hypocrisy in private and of corruption in official life. His English is as pure as was that of Woodrow Wilson. And how he hates prohibition as now administered in the United States!

Wayne B. Wheeler has nothing in common with the Senator from Maryland and he does not care who knows it. Incidentally it is not difficult to find out what Mr. Bruce thinks of the Anti-Saloon League chieftain. The faces of the drys were a study while Senator Bruce held the floor. Senator Walsh and Senator Goff also looked a little glum. Jim Reed was all smiles, and so were Edwards and Edge of New Jersey and Broussard of Louisiana, who share with Mr. Bruce the wet leadership of the Senate.

"That was a real job," murmured Representative John Philip Hill, champion wet of Baltimore, as he grasped the hand of the Senator. And the compliment was echoed by other Congressional wets who were present.

"Tut, tut" was the comment of the "bone drys" who dismissed everything Mr. Bruce said with a shrug and remarked that it would get nowhere.

All Eyes on Brennan.

In bewildering succession the wets followed Senator Bruce with their argument that the day has come to amend the Volstead law or, if possible, to repeal the Eighteenth Amendment; and, if that can't be done, amend the amendment itself so as to legalize the Government operation system, which is the rule in the Dominion of Canada.

In the rear of the room and like an island surrounded not by water but by "dry" enthusiasts, sat George Brennan of Chicago, Democratic candidate for Senator from Illinois. "No watter candidate" rides the anti-prohibition sea. The dry commanders gave very careful study to the jolly looking Democratic leader from Chicago during the three or four days he was in the room. They didn't say so out loud but it seemed as if they were framing the question: "Can we lick him!"

One more wet spokesman might be mentioned. He is Captain William H. Stayton, Annapolis graduate, former Commander of the United States Navy, now a Baltimore lawyer and founder and President of the Association Against the Prohibition Amendment, the most powerful of all the organizations working for liberalization of the prohibition laws. He stands in the reservation occupied by the leaders of the anti-dry cause. He still looks the naval officer. Mr. Wheeler is no more alert than Captain Stayton. They are "without quarter" fighters.

Labor Leaders and Others.

The list might be continued indefinitely. There were, for instance, the labor leaders, Matthew Woll of the Federation of Labor; William Sullivan of New York and a dozen others. Likewise Judge Talley of New York, the one wet to whom the audience accorded an ovation; Mrs. Viola Anglin of New York, of the probation organization of the metropolis. Representative McGregor of New York and Representative "Jimmy" Gallivan of Massachusetts.

Will they hit the target? Only time can tell. One thing appears certain, that is, the end of the hearings will not be the end of the battle. It will continue during this Congress and is sure to be resumed in the next.

"We are in to the finish and we are going to battle every inch of the way," said Senator Edwards.

"Same here," is what Mr. Wheeler could have been expected to reply had he heard what the Jersey Senator said.

Signs of Spring

By BERTRAM REINITZ.

IT IS altogether possible that bock beer is being retailed somewhere in this great metropolis, but no lithographs of goats are prominently displayed in the windows of the obscure oases distributing this vernal brew. A one-time faithful precursor of Spring has been legislated into moist history; but other harbingers still serve to apprise the dwellers in this city of concrete and asphalt that the sprouting season has arrived.

An open trolley car invites customers on the De Kalb Avenue line in Brooklyn; another is catering to fresh air fans on Boston Road in the Bronx. Established bootblacks are dragging their thronelike chairs from the pungent interiors of barber shops to points of vantage just outside. Bulletin boards in front of the employment agencies on Sixth Avenue call for handy men whose services are needed at Monticello, Kiamesha and other Sullivan County boarding houses. The private tennis courts in Midwood, Borough Park and Jackson Heights are being recoated with clay, rolled and marked, while rents in the screens surrounding them are being repaired. Every third or fourth front lawn in Flatbush serves as a putting green.

Asparagus and strawberries are supplanting more rugged comestibles in the windows of fashionable green grocers on Lexington Avenue and in the Sixties. Seed and bulb stores on Cortlandt Street are crowded.

The nineteen baseball diamonds on the Parade Grounds at Prospect Park are popular with teams on Saturday afternoons and Sunday mornings. On friendly days, rowboats swarm over the glistening surface of the little lake in Central Park near 110th Street and Lenox Avenue. Retired residents of Harlem have issued forth from their hibernation and gather in groups on the heights of Mount Morris Park.

The Sunday evening procession of automobiles on the Jericho Turnpike files toward Jamaica. The safety signals on Coney Island's roller coasters are being tested and the rails are being examined. Monday morning attendance at the Traffic Court on Mott Street, challenges the capacity of the ancient structure, and the court clerks rake in currency as fast as do the croupiers at Monte Carlo.

Rope-skipping on New York sidewalks renders hazardous the passage of pedestrians. Trans-Hudson ferryboats are thronged on week-ends with hikers bound for rambles on the Palisades. They carry lunch boxes and ukuleles and almost all, regardless of sex, wear knickers.

Below the Drive

FROM a glimpse of the two thoroughfares it is difficult to believe that only a few flights of stone steps separate Riverside Drive and Twelfth Avenue between West 125th and West 126th Streets. The Drive, for most of this distance, stretches across a wide viaduct roofing Twelfth Avenue. It bears a burden of assorted automobiles and many of its pedestrians carry walking sticks on their leisurely strolls. The buildings at each end of the bridge are tall and white and require visitors to send up their names to those on whom they are calling.

Twelfth Avenue, which comprises the lower story of this locality, has a considerably less formal aspect. There is nothing reserved or residential about it. Most of the automobiles that grace it are immobile and have been for years. A number of them are permanently parked in a large vacant lot under the viaduct. What meagre evidences are still discernible indicate that they made their début along about the time when motor cars were regarded as a passing fancy.

The tone of the avenue is not raised by its service as Summer quarters for the city's ashcarts. Many of these are now being retired after Winter work. They resemble anti-aircraft guns as they rest on their rear ends, with shafts pointing skyward. A few capacious waste-paper wagons, also off duty, lend variety to the scene. A coal pocket, three beef-dressing depots, a glass works and a building devoted to the storing and sale of hay and feed complete the setting of this street that lies a hundred feet below Riverside Drive.

The asheart custodian says he cannot remember any Drive residents coming down to see just what Twelfth Avenue was like. The custodian is much more neighborly than that. He frequently takes walks on the more pretentious highway upstairs.

Superstitious City

NEW YORK is a superstitious city, according to the expert testimony of a man in a position to know. This position is usually on the upper rungs of the twenty-five or thirty-foot ladder that he employs in the course of his store window-washing activities. He reports that there is no pedestrian traffic worth mentioning beneath his lofty perch, the preference to detour being almost universal. Whole days will frequently pass without a single breaking of this rule. Women of fashion, men of affairs and children of the tenements subscribe with equal seriousness to the popular belief that ill-omen hovers in a ladder's lee.

"Of course sometimes a guy will walk right under the ladder," the window washer admitted. "But he always looks as if he were walking on a slack wire over Niagara Falls. Even the people who won't go around the outside because they don't want to seem superstitious—they put on more speed and look uncomfortable.

"I've washed store windows on the busiest parts of Broadway for two or three hours at a time without seeing any one pass under the ladder. Just my luck, though—the only time I let my pail of water drop was when a lady who hadn't heard about the superstition was looking in the store window right under where I was working."

Gentle Lioness

IT IS extremely unlikely that any live animal in all Brooklyn enjoys the wealth of affection that is lavished upon the bronze lioness who has reclined for almost a quarter of a century on the edge of Prospect Park's formal garden overlooking the big lake. A litter of cubs shares the jungle queen's low pedestal. She is a patient hostess to the legion of youngsters for whom her shining form is a prized playground. There are occasions when her ample body provides a parking place for fully ten children, and three or four will scramble for the space left when one departs.

The lioness and her offspring were not originally intended to serve as playmates for the young visitors to the park. The group was one of a trio identical in design, conceived by Frederick MacMonnies to guard the gates of Brooklyn's broadest pastoral precinct. Two have long maintained their stolid vigil at the Third Street entrance. An imperfection caused the third to be confined to its crate and stored in a shed near the Botanical Gardens for two years, after which it was routed from retirement and placed upon its present site.

Head Gardener Quigley is reasonably certain that the children who swarm over the stately feline are insensible to the shortcoming that forced it into temporary exile. He believes that the boys and girls from Moore, Seigel, Varet and other congested streets are insufficiently acquainted with the fine arts to be sensitive to a defect in a monument that can be played upon without fear of interference by the police.

"But don't mistake me," he adds. "The lioness is much more than a mound of metal to most of the kids who climb on it. They act as if it were a great big St. Bernard dog or some other huge but friendly animal. I can't remember its being deliberately defaced or injured by any one. Any number of youngsters pet it and talk to it.

"Many of the mothers who watch their children frolicking with the lioness did the same thing themselves twenty years or so ago. I guess these young women wouldn't mind having some fun on the lioness themselves, just for old time's sake."

STRANGER THAN FICTION

A Doctor's Tragedy

By S. T. WILLIAMSON.

THE bringing of sweetness and light to the human race is not accomplished without arousing a certain amount of hate. Bitterness and controversy enter into the saving of souls and into the relief of physical pain. Both among those who would cure spiritual ills and those who strive to prolong life there is pronounced, even venomous disagreement, and enmity exists among people who have their own ways of doing good.

Sometimes the most self-sacrificing persons are the most combative. And since a by-product of all hatred is suffering, there are counter-irritants in the comfort of religion and the soothing of pain. But such paradoxes, after all, must be merely the consistencies of a topsy-turvy world.

If doctors did not disagree, there might not be many of them. Whether this is a curse or a blessing should not be decided until after fumbling through a telephone book, trying to find a physician late at night in a strange town. Yet if doctors had not disagreed there might have been little change in their status since the Middle Ages, when the chirugeon and the barber were one and the same. And if they were not self-sacrificing so many of them would not have died in a forgiving spirit, unrecognized and unrewarded.

Such was the spirit shown in the declining years of life by an old British doctor over whose grave the earth is still fresh.

For seventy years his record of medical service was one of honor and compassion. He had worked among the poor and refused their money. He had served abroad, and thirty years ago he was a passenger on board a fever-ridden ship homeward bound from China. The ship's doctor died, and single-handed the physician passenger cared for three hundred patients, a service which brought him the thanks of the British Government and personal commendation from Queen Victoria.

***

YEARS later he interested himself in the work of a young man who had not seen fit to acquire a medical degree, but had achieved remarkable success in correcting disorders of the joints. Bones grown or wrenched out of place were restored to position by this unorthodox young London practitioner, to whom various names were given. Osteopath was a new word; hence "bonesetter," "manipulative surgeon," and "bloodless surgery" were some of the terms applied.

When the old practitioner had the temerity to assist the osteopath in some of his treatments, what followed was like the fate of a union mechanic who worked in an open shop. Two colleges of surgeons withdrew their degrees. The General Medical Council, in which is vested the control of regular practitioners in Great Britain, struck the old doctor's name from the list of licensed physicians for "infamous conduct" in having administered ether to an osteopath's patient. And the seventy-year-old man, now a medical outlaw, had not improved his case with the council by prophesying that the osteopath would achieve professional recognition.

Without some flight of fancy, the story of the old doctor would drag here. His end would not be happy without the satisfaction of the prophecy coming true. Yet it would be laying fiction on too thick to advance the young osteopath to knighthood, to make him the subject of a petition by 300 members of Parliament that some form of official favor be bestowed upon him for his achievements. Still denied the right to engage in regular practice, the old doctor lived to see some of the most distinguished British surgeons, including the King's physician, sign a petition to the Premier that the next honor list should contain the name of the young "bonesetter."

And with his one-time unorthodox associate now "Sir Herbert," the expected happy ending would be for the authorities to restore the old physician to practice and let him die in peace and with a light heart.

***

AS a matter of fact, it proved far easier in Great Britain to elevate an osteopath to knighthood at the instance of regular practitioners than to reverse action taken fifteen years ago against an obscure physician who acted as anesthetist for an unlicensed practitioner.

The doctor, now in his eighties, became the subject of a controversy which spilled over into the press and Parliament. Eminent men came to his support, but they brought no patients. The Englishman's right of free speech in letters to The London Times was invoked by indignant personages, including Bernard Shaw. Even the Thunderer itself declared that the old physician's offense was chiefly "assisting to teach his professional brethren certain operations in surgery which they had neglected," and that the "public is not unaware that the names of convicted drunkards sometimes are restored after the lapse of a few years to the medical register."

Older and older, weaker and weaker grew the old doctor. Three months ago the College of Surgeons at Edinburgh erased its cancellation of the diploma. This action was refused by the Royal College of Surgeons at London, but the way was paved for the General Medical Council to right the injustice done fifteen years ago. The council's next meeting is within a month, but that was too long to wait. Last week the old doctor died with a broken heart, but with forgiveness on his lips.

There died in London last week at his eighty-sixth year Dr. F. v. Ashen, whose name was struck from the medical register in 1911 because he acted as anesthetist to Sir Herbert Barker.

"Ladies and gentlemen, I have been guilty of a most deplorable oversight. I did not propose the health of the King." He looked around the many tables and said very quietly, with his glass of wine held aloft: "The King." All stood and drank and felt sorry for the embarrassed toastmaster.

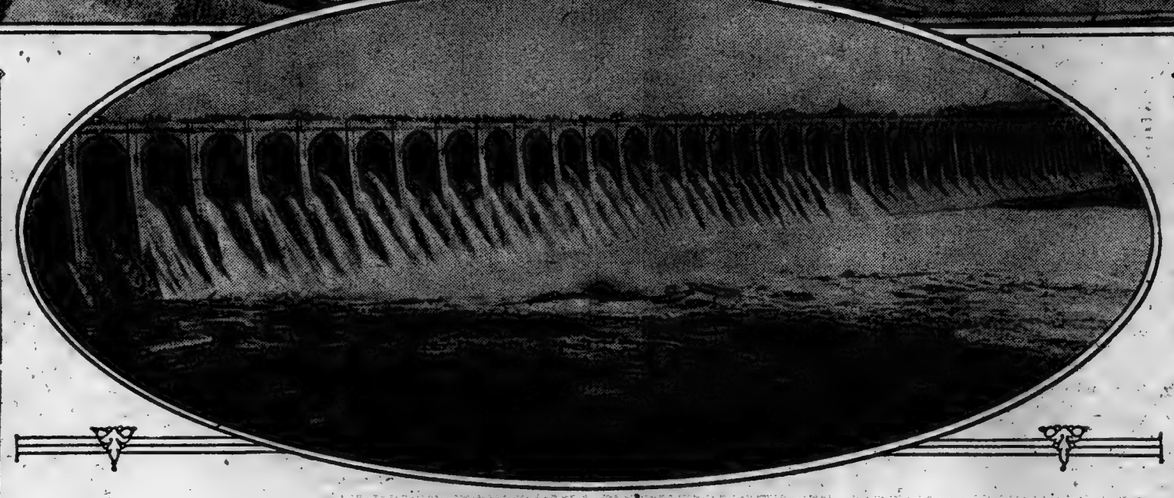
CONGRESS SEEKS LIGHT ON MUSCLE SHOALS

Puzzle of How to Utilize Effectively the Great Tennessee Water Power Project Comes Again Before Joint Committee—Remarkable Engineering Work, Inspired by War Fervor, Passes High Tests

The Locks Above the Wilson Dam

The Wilson Dam, Seen From Down Stream



A Close-up of the Spillway From the Down Stream Side

By FRANK BOHN.

THE great dam at Muscle Shoals is probably the most efficient piece of construction work ever accomplished in this country. It will be worth much more than its cost, ultimately, as a producer of power and it is a splendid example of modern engineering skill, but so far it has been treated as a belated orphan produced by the economic orgy of war.

Probably no local issue in fifty years has perplexed Congress as much as the disposition of this property. The matter has been an issue for more than seven years. No executive and no Congress during that time has found a solution. No real buyer has appeared except Henry Ford, and Ford's offer did not satisfy Congress.

The next move is to be a public hearing on April 26 under a joint resolution of Congress. A committee of six, three from each house, will take testimony; prospective buyers will be there and representatives of the farm organizations, and agents of near-by cities and public utility corporations. Possibly somebody will suggest a solution of the Muscle Shoals puzzle.

The dam and power plant cost $55,000,000. There is, besides, one nitrogen plant (Haber method) which cost $12,000,000. This plant is probably worth its cost. But the cyanamid nitrogen plant, which cost $70,000,000, is now believed to be antiquated and will probably have to be junked.

Impressions of Muscle Shoals.

Is all this expenditure to be lost to the Federal Treasury and to the taxpayer? No. There is a value attaching to this great work that cannot be destroyed. It is concerned with the execution of the nation's larger policy of hydroelectrical development and should profoundly affect that extensive task through the generations to come.

An old field correspondent of an engineering publication recently made an extended visit to Muscle Shoals. He spent most of his nights on the dam.

"I'm enjoying an entirely new engineering experience," he said. "This job is so magnificent and wonderful that I have come to believe that it has a soul; so I've spent my nights cultivating an acquaintance with this strange new spiritual being. While I feel its presence in looking at it by day, I seem to sense the inner life of the job, in its peculiar power, only when I go and put my hands upon it at night."

Common laborers not a few have been heard to express themselves as moved with the same feeling that obsessed the engineering writer. This peculiar stimulation produced by the grandeur of a gigantic architectural masterpiece is, of course, a most ancient experience of the poetic mind. Those who wrought at designing and constructing the Gothic cathedrals of the Middle Ages were so thrilled by the vast conceptions of their work that their hearts as well as their hands moved in unison. When Cheops was done, probably the slaves who toiled upon it that day paused to look up and wonder.

Great Dam a Vast Work.

At Muscle Shoals, within a sweep of the eye, one can see what modern man can do with his machines toward the control of his environment. Since we did not make the mountains or the stars, our appreciation of them must ever be objective and limited. But in our great works of architecture and engineering man appears as creator. We have wrought ourselves into them—not ourselves as individuals, nor as mere groups of individuals—but as vast and complex civilizations.

At Muscle Shoals our contemporary America has constructed a modern and impressive work.

On the Colorado, we are told, we are to construct a dam 550 feet high, higher than the Washington Monument. On the St. Lawrence we are presently to throw dams across a most magnificent river. But the great dam at Muscle Shoals marks the present measure of our striving. Here, for reasons we shall come to presently, is a highly significant American contribution to contemporary civilization. If one starts out in the dawn—if one wanders over and about it, and looks and learns and thinks, until, beyond the clear waters of Wilson Lake above the dam, there comes the red flush of the next dawn—during even these twenty-four short hours one can begin to perceive both the statesmanship and the poetry inherent in modern hydroelectric engineering.

To understand this structure one must go back to its simplest form, the old mill dam on the creek. That little dam poured the waters of the stream over a wheel at the end of a race or funnel. Its wheel, in turning, turned the millstone by direct contact.

Mill Dam Grown Prodigious.

At Muscle Shoals the dam has grown to be nearly a mile long and ninety-five feet high. It is constructed of 1,400,000 cubic yards of concrete of the highest quality. At one end are two navigation locks, each 60 by 300 feet, made to lift vessels up over the dam. At the other end the electric power house has taken the place of the old mill wheel. This power house now contains eight units, which can develop 260,000 horsepower. Eventually there will be eighteen, capable of developing 612,000 horsepower.

All United States Government work of the Muscle Shoals sort is undertaken by the Corps of Engineers of the army. But when a peculiarly difficult task is under way the corps is permitted by law to retain expert civilian help. The corps and the civilian staff, when they work together as at Muscle Shoals, are designated the Department of Engineers.

The writer spent the better part of a day in company with the designing and supervising engineer, examining one of the 260,000 horsepower units. The great dam, considered as a simple instrument, functions through these colossal machines, the power of the falling water becoming the power of electricity. The machinery looks its part—a twentieth-century Frankenstein that has laid an unready Government by the ears. Nobody at Washington appears to know what to do with it. The engineers on the job are prepared with the correct answer, but the politicians apparently are not seeking sound economic engineering advice regarding Muscle Shoals.

Conceived in Patriotism.

In 1917-18 certain members of Congress decided that it would be advisable for the Federal Government to build a power plant at Muscle Shoals. The ostensible purpose was to furnish power to run two nitrate plants, which were to turn out the product needed in the manufacture of high explosives for the war. Since the decision taken in 1917-18 to create Muscle Shoals for national defense purposes, synthetic chemistry has proved that water power is no longer necessary in the slightest degree for national defense or for peace-time fertilizer production.

The war ended Nov. 11, 1918; the first unit in the power house at Muscle Shoals was not assembled and ready for testing in December, 1925. Yet Congress wrought better than it knew. It furnished a skillful artist and teacher with his supreme opportunity to produce his masterpiece and so instruct the nation.

The designer, as he looked at the waters of the Tennessee rushing over the Shoals on a day early in 1918, perceived the basic facts of the situation. He said to himself:

"If I am indeed to work here instead of with the army in France, I will make my work count to the utmost in the service of my country." He would set an abiding example in engineering efficiency; with the support of the Government he would create a standard to which others, engaged upon similar tasks, must repair. Whereupon he bent himself to his task. And the details are as interesting, indeed, as the fundamental conception.

The first question an engineer must answer, in making his preliminary plans for a dam, concerns the structure of the river bed and the banks. Some might have been satisfied with the information obtained from a few score of borings in the rocky bed. Altogether over twelve hundred exploration holes were drilled. These varied from thirty to one hundred feet in depth. Where any cavity was found it was filled with concrete. Water-bearing seams were filled and then retested by compressed air for the determination of their perfect tightness.

In the south bluff abutment section of the dam the explorations for the proving of tightness revealed unexpected porosity and made necessary the boring of over half a mile of tunnels. These tunnels revealed various unexpected and large cavities below the new pool levels, and altogether some 15,000 cubic yards of concrete were necessary to close up the cavities.

Geological "dentistry" of this sort is always necessary in the construction of dams; but the stratified condition of the rock in the Muscle Shoals district required special attention in the exploration of the river bed. Tests after the dam was finished have proved, in so far as human observation of a fact of this sort can prove, that the geological dentistry over this entire mile stretch of river bottom was successful.

Everything considered, the damming up of a strong river is the most extraordinary task to which engineering skill can address itself. For, while any workman may sometimes deceive his employer or the most careful inspector, and a crafty lawyer may write a tricky phrase into a contract, there is at least one place on earth where tricks fail, errors are discovered and poor work cannot be disguised. Against the river no man can play the cheat. In the end some one must redress the balance.

Passes Efficiency Tests.

Here, upon the shoals of the Middle Tennessee, was to be a dam which could serve our children's children and not settle in the bed, slip a single inch down stream, or crumble at any point in all the years till then.

There are two "schools" of concrete making. One advocates concrete that is made soft in the mixer, and the other a product that is stiffer and harder. Soft concrete is made and placed more quickly than hard concrete. The latter, costing more time and effort, stands up better and lasts longer. The Wilson Dam is built of hard concrete.

The materials for making concrete consist of broken stone, or gravel, of about four and one-half parts, an acceptable grade of sand, two and a half parts, and an acceptable Portland cement, one part. The testing of these materials involves a broad experience of their use. After they have been assembled they must be mixed with just the right amount of water in order that the cement may be distributed throughout the mixture and thereafter complete its hydration, or set.

In the construction of the Wilson Dam every reasonable expense was allowed which might increase the efficiency of the work. Recent efficiency tests have fully justified the efforts put forth. The object in mind was never primarily to complete a certain part of the work on a certain date. Indeed, the largest ultimate purpose throughout the work was, "Let us see first how well we can build." The dam should be a thing of beauty as well as of utility—a creation in which the whole nation might take pride. But its beauty should rise from the rock-bottom of its truth; in the foundations of its truth there should be no dark and hidden holes.

Ideals Wrought in Concrete.

This dam is comparable to a great cathedral, built when the builders wrought character and spirit into every carving and buttress. The likeness between the two structures is seen in all its clearness at the point to which we are now drawing attention. It is primarily because of the character wrought into this great work that it becomes so large a national asset. In constructing Notre Dame or Westminster Abbey each toiler conceived of his day's work in terms of the finished structure.

From beginning to end, in building Wilson Dam no contractor was permitted to interfere with this unity of purpose. All the work was done by the direct employment of all the help. Even the humblest was inspired with the vision without which no such work can attain perfection. So this colossal block of concrete is a kind of temple in which there is indwelling the pure ideals of the nation.

The top of the Wilson Dam is a bridge—a broad, smooth highway flung a mile across the Tennessee. It is a link in the Dixie Highway. At night this bridge is lighted up like Fifth Avenue. The lighting system was made as much a study by experts as boring the holes in the river bed. The lamps are placed in the walls which ensconce the roadway on either side. From above or below one sees no lights at all only an orange glow, like a halo, over the bridge.

From almost every aspect the purposes of the dam are always indicated in the seeing. Take the matter of the gates that control the flow of the river. These gates are fifty-eight in number. They are raised and lowered by hydraulic pressure. A single man can open them all within two hours. When, in December, the writer looked down upon the flood below, the roaring waters poured through only three open gates. The purpose of the gates is to accomplish perfect flood control.

Purposes of the Dams.

In the power house the river is thrown against the collar and pulls the load. If there is more water than is needed at any time, the surplus flow automatically is directed through the gates and thrown away.

At the north end of the dam are the navigation locks. A small amount of power will serve to control their use. A generation ago the soldier and scholar General Robert of the Corps of Engineers of the Army dug the ship canal around the shoals. Time presses so fast in our generation that though the canal was the work of General Robert's later period of service he lived to see the beginnings of the dam which would hide his canal ninety-five feet deep under water.

Everywhere hydroelectric development is proving a benediction to the inland waterways. Instead of digging canals, dams are built to flood the shoals and shallow places in the rivers. And the hydroelectricity often pays for the improvement many times over. The completed dams, 1, 2 and 3, on the Tennessee River, will solve the problem of navigation at Muscle Shoals as it could not be solved by digging a canal. It may be noted here that dam 1, two miles downstream, is already completed. It has been constructed for navigation purposes only and is 10 feet high. Wilson Dam, 3, twenty miles above 2, will be 40 feet high and cover the shoals as far as Decatur. All three will account for over 140 feet of drop in the river.

These locks lend an added interest to the dam. With the improvement of dam 3, cargo and passenger ships and sporting craft of every description will ride the waves of the lake for fifty miles.

The Public Advantage.

That works built of concrete may have beauty as well as utility is demonstrated by the finished result at Muscle Shoals. "The designs must first be perfect from a utility standpoint, and then be made as beautiful and uplifting as possible, within reason"—this has been the daily motto from the time when one man visualized and began this construction, all the way through to the end, when eighty engineers and 4,000 workmen were employed. To succeed it was necessary to represent the simple beauty of colossal strength.

How shall this power be used to the greatest public advantage? That happens to be at present a political problem; and toward efforts to solve political problems people as well as politicians are inclined to shirk responsibility.

The engineer went to Niagara and commanded the cataract to work for man. Now the engineer has gone to the Tennessee and built a new Niagara. Such creative exploits have the touch of genius which inspired Shakespeare and Galileo. Most political leaders give the impression that they are one with Rip Van Winkle and Falstaff. The best answer for the question as to whether they are growing better or worse in this decade will soon be furnished by the disposition that Congress makes of the Muscle Shoals plant.

REPUBLICAN IOWA TURNS TO A DEMOCRAT

WASHINGTON.

ONE of the rarest sights in American political history is on view in the Senate wing of the Capitol at Washington—a Democratic Senator from the rock-ribbed Republican stronghold of Iowa. His name is Daniel F. Steck and he is a World War veteran.

On April 12 the Senate, by a vote of 45 to 41, deprived Smith Wildman Brookhart of his seat and gave it to Steck, whose race for the Senate in 1924, the year of the Coolidge landslide, was one of the surprising chapters in the annals of Senatorial campaigns. Both men claimed the election and Brookhart was seated. Steck was supposed to have been defeated by 5,000 votes, but the Senate committee that canvassed the returns decided that the Democratic candidate had won by 1,500 votes. The Senate upheld that view and so Republican Iowa has a Democratic Senator.

The action of the Senate is expected to precipitate one of the bitterest political fights ever known west of the Mississippi. The battle will be for the seat now held by Albert B. Cummins, the veteran senior Senator from Iowa. Brookhart is expected to announce his candidacy for Senator Cummins's seat, and political Washington takes it for granted that the Brookhart-Cummins battle will soon be under way. It is admitted in all camps that the outcome of the primary which will decide the contest, so far as the Republican nomination is concerned, will be in doubt until the last minute.

Primary day in Iowa is June 5. Mr. Cummins will stand for renomination as a tried and true Coolidge Republican, while Brookhart is certain to seek the nomination as an out-and-out progressive, not of the Roosevelt but of the La Follette school. It will be another test of the Coolidge strength in the Middle West.

Steck's Last-Minute Entry.

Just what happened in Iowa in 1924? Iowa is so overwhelmingly Republican that Senator Brookhart's alliance with La Follette and his open repudiation of Coolidge were made the outstanding issue in the campaign. Less than two weeks before the last day for filing for the primaries in 1924, although Steck had frequently been mentioned as of Senatorial timber, no definite move whatever had been made in his behalf. Two other Democrats had already qualified, one of them John D. Denison of Des Moines, who later became La Follette's State campaign manager.

On the evening of the last day of the State convention at Davenport, in April of 1924, an informal caucus of about two hundred Democrats was held to discuss candidates. Denison was present and made an address. Steck was with a group of service men in a room in the same hotel. He was reluctant to make the race, feeling he could lead nothing more than a forlorn hope, but he, like his comrades, felt that Denison should not be the Democratic nominee.

Fast talking and thinking were done, for haste was vital if Steck was to be placed before the party wheelhorses in such a way they would immediately have his nomination papers signed and get behind him.

Frank Miles was chosen to hasten to the caucus and present Steck as a possibility. Upon his arrival Harry C. Evans, editor of The Yeoman Shield, who served as a Y. M. C. A. secretary overseas and knew what Steck's comrades were thinking, saw to it that Miles got the floor. Miles spoke twenty minutes.

Denison was put on the grill and failed to clear himself of the charges of "radicalism" that Miles made against him. The result was that the caucus swung behind Steck, his papers were circulated in the next few days and he beat Denison with ease.

Republicans Desert Brookhart.

Brookhart, who professed to be a Progressive Republican won the Republican nomination from former Congressman Burton E. Sweet, conservative, after a heated struggle. But with all the bitterness that remained after that battle, no one thought that Steck had a chance until Brookhart delivered a speech at Emmettsburg, Iowa, in which he denounced President Coolidge. Thousands of regular Republicans, including most of the members of the State organization, leaped at once to Steck's support.

A big factor in the situation was the Republican ex-Service Men's League, of which Assistant Secretary of War Hanford MacNider was National President. This organization was composed of one Republican service man in each of the State's ninety-nine counties. It came out against La Follette and Brookhart and declared for Coolidge and Steck.

Mr. Steck started traveling over Iowa as soon as he was nominated. He drove night and day, making from two to ten speeches every twenty-four hours. He made an address at Burlington, however, that undoubtedly cost him many Democratic votes. It was on the methods alleged to have been used by Senator Wheeler and others in obtaining evidence in the Daugherty investigation. Steck said he was misquoted by the press, but much of the harm could not be repaired.

For a time there was danger of a split in his own ranks, but his Republican support held intact and he came down the homestretch with the most enthusiastic following a Democratic Senatorial candidate had ever mustered in Iowa. Betting odds were against him up to the hour the polls closed.

By His Own Efforts.

Mr. Steck was born at Ottumwa, Iowa, Dec. 16, 1881. He was graduated in the Ottumwa public schools and was graduated from the College of Law at the State University in 1906. He was active in athletics and many other college activities. He was a poor boy and during his vacations worked as a farm hand, a cow puncher and a civil engineer's helper.

From 1906 to the present, except from June, 1917, to May, 1919, he has practiced law at Ottumwa. He was elected County Attorney of Wapello County in 1910, was re-elected in 1912 and led his ticket both times. He was a delegate to the 1924 National Democratic Convention at New York City and was Temporary Chairman of the State Democratic Convention held in Des Moines in 1924. His father, the late A. C. Steck, was one of the most prominent Democrats in Southeastern Iowa for many years.

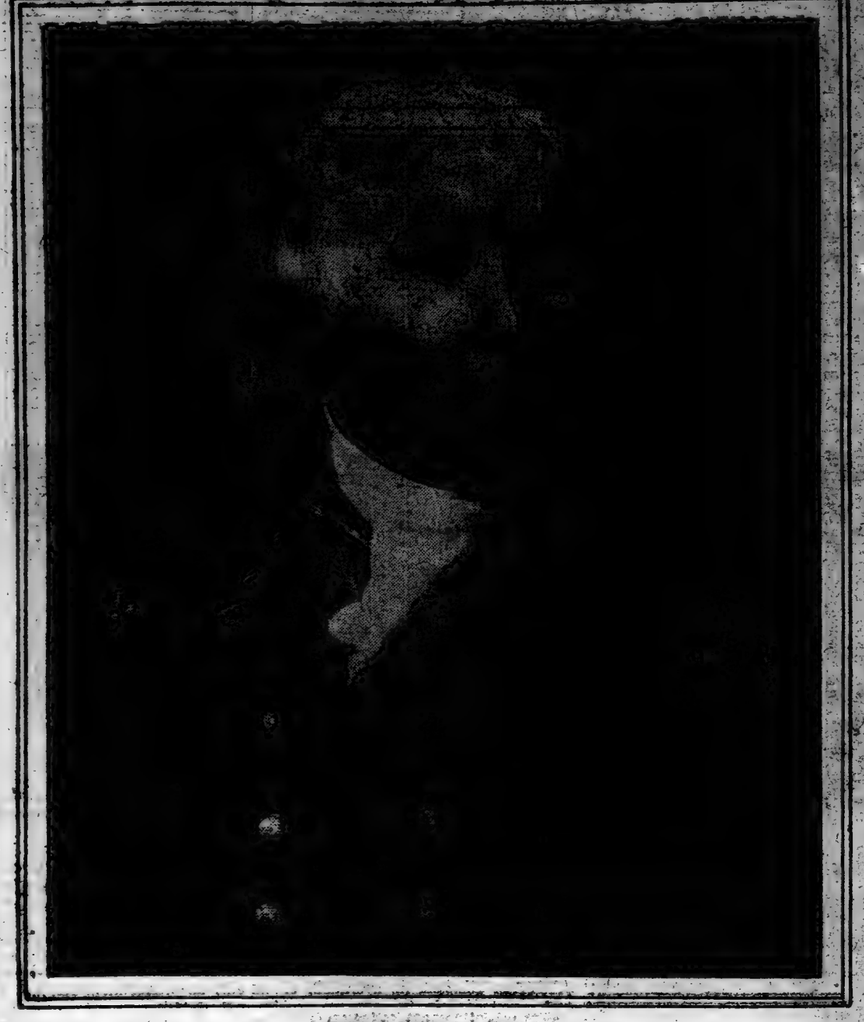
LETTERS REVEAL GENERAL GREENE'S HEROISM

American Commander Wrote to Great and Small as He Harried Cornwallis in Southern Campaign of the Revolution



General Nathanael Greene

By RANDOLPH G. ADAMS,
Curator the Clements Library of American History, University of Michigan.

THE commander who wins campaigns rather than the commander who wins battles is the one that carves out a niche for himself in the hall of history. Pyrrhus, King of Epirus, could win his battles against Rome 2,000 years ago, and Ludendorf could win victories over the French in 1917. Both of them are sorry figures in history. The men whom history remembers are Scipio and Foch. That is the fundamental explanation of the victory of the United States in the American Revolution.

The triumphs of the Revolution, so far as individual battles are concerned, belong to Lieut. Gen. Earl Cornwallis. It was Cornwallis who drove the Americans up the Hudson after the Battle of Long Island; it was Cornwallis who turned the American flank at the Battle of Brandywine and drove them from the field; it was Cornwallis who devastated the South in the last years of the Revolution, winning victory after victory, defeating Gates at Camden and all but annihilating the American Army. Cornwallis was the "Stonewall Jackson of the British Army, brave, gallant and daring.

Greene's Part Revealed.

But the British lost the war, and the decisive conflict was the surrender of that same Cornwallis. It is not the victors in battles who count.

There were several things that contributed to the final success of the Americans: the brilliant strategy of Washington in feinting against New York and then throwing himself on Yorktown, and the presence of the French sea power, which was the sine qua non of victory. But it is not too much to say that the military genius of General Greene in wearing out Cornwallis was the essential prerequisite of the victory which Washington and Rochambeau staged at Yorktown in October of 1781. And Washington was the first to admit it.

The original manuscripts from which the inside story can at last be told have emerged from their hiding place in the vault of a Brooklyn trust company and have been added to the collection of printed books and manuscripts which William L. Clements of Bay City, Mich., has placed in the library at the University of Michigan which bears his name.

General Greene belongs to Rhode Island, and that State has in recent years done justice to his memory by bringing his body back from Georgia and having it reinterred in his native State and buying the Greene homestead at Coventry as a memorial to Washington's greatest lieutenant. That Washington so regarded Greene becomes clear to the most superficial reader of the recently acquired Greene papers.

In 1780 the American Army in the South was evidently to be the chief object of British attack. The British had failed in New England early in the war; they had failed in New York when Burgoyne surrendered; they failed in Pennsylvania when Sir Henry Clinton evacuated Philadelphia in 1778. The British commanders decided to win the war by attacking and occupying the prosperous cities of the South Atlantic seaboard and defeating the American armies which Washington had dispatched thither.

By the end of 1780 they had all but succeeded. Savannah was in British hands; Charleston, S. C., was captured with the entire American army under General Lincoln. Cornwallis ran wild over the Southern States and caught General Horatio Gates at Camden, S. C. Gates's defeat was the worst the Americans sustained in the entire war—his army was routed and scattered.

In this dark hour Washington picked Nathanael Greene to take command of the Southern armies and retrieve the fast-ebbing fortunes of the United States. In November of 1780 Greene started South, stopping at each State capital as he passed to see how far he could count on the support of the State Governors. On Dec. 2 he reached Charlotte, N. C., where the humiliated Gates was waiting in despair with the remnants of the American Army which had not deserted or been captured or killed.

The General's First Act.

The first thing Greene did marks him as the kind of man who knew his business. He did not begin by making a speech to the dispirited army. It is doubtful whether oratory could have helped—particularly in that part of the country where they have always bred orators. The first act of the new commander was to appoint a new chief quartermaster. The second thing he did was to appoint a new paymaster. The one protested that he knew nothing about supplies, and the other protested that he know nothing about accounting for money. Greene replied dryly: "That is all right; we have neither supplies nor money, so don't let that worry you."

Both those offices today come under the Quartermaster Corps. While perhaps one would not say that Greene regarded the Quartermaster Department as the most important division of the army, still there is no getting around the fact that that was the first impulse he acted on. Napoleon said, "An army travels on its stomach." When, in 1777, Washington's own army in the North had been at its worst, he had appointed Greene Quartermaster General; and so the new commander in the South was in a position to know the difference between essentials and non-essentials in conducting a war.

After organizing his supply service, Greene's next move was to secure boats. He bought boats (on credit), he impressed boats, he stole boats and he built boats. Why boats? Because the one way to move supplies quickly in the Carolinas was up and down the rivers.

With a transport service organized, he then established supply depots in every town of any size which was not in the hands of the British. Letter after letter we have which he sent to these depot quartermasters. Each letter states in the most picturesque language that the American Army lacked everything and that the individual depot quartermaster would have to work as if ultimate victory had depended on his efforts alone.

Greene's next move was to establish an intelligence service. There were plenty of loyal and patriotic Americans in the Carolinas, who, despite defeats, were perfectly willing to go on fighting for independence. But widely separated, dwelling in the swamps or in the hills, they could do little against the ability to operate in inside lines. Greene at once got in touch with men like Francis Marion in North Carolina and Thomas Sumter in South Carolina and "Light-horse Harry" Lee of Virginia.

These were the men upon whom he would depend to win the war. They were the men who slept on horseback and had that capacity for inspiring loyalty which the Southerner, like the Northerner of these days, felt primarily for his State and seldom for the Union. The Rhode Islander was quick to understand the State sensitiveness that he found. He did not try to order the Southerners around—he got their own local leaders to do it.

Circling the British.

When by organizing a scout and spy service he kept himself in almost daily touch with these three great cavalry leaders in Virginia and the Carolinas, we find that another subject begins to pervade the letters. The excessive emphasis in quartermaster supplies now gives way to a constant call for horses, horses and yet more horses. If "Light-horse Harry" was to be pursued by Cornwallis by always keeping in Cornwallis's rear, he needed fleet horses. Greene made every effort to secure them.

After establishing his own troops and communication with the Southern leaders, Greene then began to teach them how to march around Cornwallis. "You will keep your quartermaster ahead of the troops not less than three days and have provisions laid in at the place you mean to halt each night."

Then came the days when his scouts and foragers had gathered in all the supplies the country afforded. There were no shoes. Greene promptly appointed an assistant quartermaster in charge of hides. Part of the new man's duty was to see that no beef was ever killed unless its hide was saved; the rest of his task was to enlist shoemakers in the army.

Before long an entirely new spirit animated the United States armies in the South. Cornwallis suddenly found his supplies scarce, because Greene had secured the country before him. Then the British commander found his supply columns cut off and captured. Greene had organized General Daniel Morgan's flying column, which was always just where Cornwallis thought it was not.

The British commander began to worry. The same library at Ann Arbor, Mich., that now holds these Greene papers holds also all the reports sent by Cornwallis to his superior, Sir Henry Clinton, so we know just how worried Cornwallis was.

Letters Tell the Tale.

But Greene did not slacken for a moment. An examination of the "retained correspondence file" at the American headquarters for one day proves Greene's astounding capacity for hard work. On one day there would be a letter from the President of Congress telling him that the troops needed everything and intimating that if Congress did not stop playing politics and do something they need not hold him responsible for results. On the same day there would likewise be a letter to Governor Thomas Jefferson of Virginia, thanking him for his loyal support, and wishing that all State Governors were as active.

The next letter bearing the same date might be a tip to Marion that a British expedition was headed his way and, expressing hopes that Marion would catch it. Greene was very careful about giving orders to Marion, but Marion was the kind of man who did not need orders. He only needed a suggestion to be off at a gallop, and before nightfall Lord Cornwallis would have another gray hair—not only because of what Marion did, but also from uncertainty of where Marion would be next.

In the same mail would go out strict general orders to all unit commanders against plundering or pillaging. "All marauding and plundering will be punished on the spot with not less than fifty stripes for every offense." Yet with all this the day's business would close with a personal letter to General Weedon expressing his regret that Mrs. Weedon was so upset by her husband's having to rejoin his command before his wounds were healed and telling Weedon to take his time about reporting to General von Steuben.

Greene's letters to his own Generals are delightful. He was exceedingly strict at the same time that he was appreciative of the sensitiveness of his brave partisan leaders. Word came to the American headquarters one day that a message under a flag of truce was coming from Lord Cornwallis. The message turned out to be a long and querulous complaint from his Lordship that the Americans were not playing fair, that they were plundering the Tories, burning their houses and murdering the poor, deluded folk who remained loyal to their own King George. That was not sporting, urged Cornwallis, and, he continued, those fellows, Sumter and Pickens, are the most lawless set of bandits that ever wore a uniform.

Greene sat down and dictated a letter to Pickens and another to Sumter. To both he spoke severely, directing them to cease their irregular conduct of the war and to fight like civilized gentlemen. Not a word of comfort for them. Then he sat down and wrote a reply to Cornwallis. The general tenor of it is this:

"You complain of the behavior of my subordinates, Sumter and Pickens. Very well; who started this business of burning houses? It was the British themselves who burned Charleston during the battle of Bunker Hill. Who started this business of robbing innocent non-combatants and insulting them? It was your Hessians who began, the moment they landed, to treat Americans as a conquered people to be looted. Who started this business of murder and massacre?"

Strengthening Discipline of Army.

There were too many examples of British guilt to be mentioned. Lord Cornwallis got cold comfort from that letter—but Greene turned to good account in strengthening the discipline of his own army.

The number of details which Greene could keep in his mind at one time without confusion is startling. He had that Napoleonic capacity not only for directing that certain supplies should be at a certain place at a certain time, but also for seeing that they got there. And never once did he let up from his flood of letters to the State Governors, the Board of War at Philadelphia and the President of the Continental Congress, urging them to even greater and greater efforts in behalf of the army.

As a commander in the field he displayed the same resourcefulness. He met the British under Cornwallis at Guilford Court House, N. C., was defeated, lost all his artillery and retreated—whither? For the next three weeks his letters are dated "The Iron Works, Virginia." Why "Iron Works"? Because he had lost his artillery. Moreover, Cornwallis never ventured to risk another "victory" like Guilford Court House. If he had ventured, he would not have had any army to fight with. One cannot estimate Greene's capacity as a commander by noting who it was that held the field of battle when the sun went down. Greene seldom held the field—but his opponent frequently had nothing else with which to comfort himself.

Merely to follow the date lines to his letters tells a story all by itself. Greene had Frederick the Great's capacity for rushing around the country with a small staff and a few cavalry troops and yet keeping out of the way of the British. He would go from one of his flying columns to another, and the next day be off to still another. Cornwallis could never be quite sure where Greene was. The British spies would report that Greene's army was at such-and-such a place—but where was Greene?

After a battle Greene was never so busy that he forgot his wounded soldiers. He insisted on the care of the poor fellows who had been brought off the field to his own hospitals, and he took care to see that proper attention was given to those who had fallen into the hands of the British. After the second battle of Camden he wrote to Lord Rawdon, the British commander, offering to trade surgeons and insisting on the proper care by the British of the wounded Americans, even mentioning individual officers.

Greene was strict and severe, but there is evidence that he was a human being and that his soldiers loved and respected him. The supplies that came by wagon train were often broken open en route. Greene had been a quartermaster himself, and he knew how to stop the leaks, but his complaint was not so much against his own starved soldiers as against the Board of War at Philadelphia and the Governors of the States.

The wanting of the country in the Carolinas finally became so serious that Greene wrote Congress he could no longer subsist a good-sized army anywhere in the South. But six days later we find him writing in exultation to John Marshall: "You will have heard before this reaches you of the evacuation of Camden. The enemy were so distressed for want of provisions that it is probable they have quitted Camden in order to cover more effectually their ports to the south."

British Are Discouraged.

If the Carolinas would not subsist Greene, neither would they support Cornwallis. Then come the messages of Cornwallis withdrawing all his outlying detachments and abandoning forts and posts he had won at great cost. The British troops were huddled into the seaboard cities, and Cornwallis started on his march to the North. There was no use trying to beat an opponent like Greene, so his lordship decided to try a Virginia campaign. Futile days followed for him. The end of the story is known to every American child—Lord Cornwallis himself fell back upon Yorktown and was caught in a trap.

The result of Greene's campaign in wearing down Cornwallis is seen in the papers that will now forever rest in adjacent bookcases in the same library in Michigan. The papers of Sir Henry Clinton contain the last desperate messages from Cornwallis, pleading for reinforcements, warning Clinton that his army is worn out, and, finally, the famous letter from Cornwallis to Clinton, "I have the mortification to inform your Excellency that I have been obliged to surrender the posts at Yorktown and Gloucester and all the troops under my command." Greene's share in making that letter possible cannot be overlooked.

Proof of His Genius.

The variety of Greene's correspondents is the most important commentary that can be made upon his genius. No politician was so high that Greene did not write him a direct letter calling him to account for not doing all that could be done. No tradesman was too small to be reminded of the bit he could do to aid the cause.

Greene's letters show that he was a well-read man. "We have some supplies, but this place is no Egypt," he writes on one occasion. That may seem like a simple enough allusion, but a question started around the room at a luncheon club or in a college class would today reveal few who could explain it. His capacity for expressing himself in good, clear English can only be explained by the fact that his thoughts were clear.

He could see further than his Generals and than his opponents, and he knew that true greatness consists not in doing the spectacular but in accomplishing things in spite of odds and difficulties.

His relationship with politicians enabled him to see clearly the human weaknesses of the States who refused to act until they were themselves attacked—when it was usually too late to do anything. Yet that insight did not discourage him. It merely served as the occasion for personal letters which reveal a tremendous knowledge of human nature.

MUSSOLINI HAS BEGUN TO RECONSTRUCT ROME

Monuments of Past Ages to Be Uncovered—Plans for Tunneling the Seven Hills Studied by Engineers

By EDWIN W. HULLINGER.
ROME.

WHATEVER its ultimate influence on the political and social destiny of Italy, the Fascist régime is planning reconstruction measures of a physical nature that will leave a permanent stamp on the City of Rome, and doubtless on several other Italian cities. The work will be commenced on Rome's birthday, April 21.

Not since the days of Augustus, the golden era of the Roman Empire to which Mussolini continually refers, has such a far-reaching change in the form of the ancient capital been projected. Rome is not only the Mecca for tourists and for art and religious pilgrims from all lands, but, as the cradle of Western civilization, what affects Rome interests the world.

The "regulatory plan," the official title of Mussolini's reconstruction program, includes not only what might be termed the resurrection of the ancient part of Rome, but a transfer of a large part of the city's present economic life to a point several kilometers from its present focus and a decided change in the layout of the capital. It involves the cutting of new streets through the centre of Rome. These are designed to free the city from the traffic congestion that has come from forcing the vehicular activity of the twentieth century through passageways made for the leisurely ways of the ancients. It envisages the building of a ring of boulevards on the pattern of Parisian or Viennese boulevards and the creation of new squares and parks to make the Eternal City a modern city beautiful.

Seven Hills to Be Tunneled.

Again, the plan involves tunnelling deep under the famous Seven Hills to provide subways that will divert part of Rome's surface traffic into underground corridors. It will combine twentieth century social improvement ideas with the traditional measures of ancient Romans by providing immense public baths, patterned after Rome's early institutions, and by erecting, at State expense, hundreds of workingmen's houses near what is to be Rome's new industrial centre.

In short, the "regulatory plan" is intended to redeem the old Rome and remake the new. Although the first part of the program appeals strongly to sentiment and represents a positive cultural achievement, the latter phase of the plan is, from the viewpoint of present-day Italy, more important.

The refashioning of a great city—especially one that has taken some two thousand years to reach its present form—is an undertaking of no mean size. Rather than try to remold ancient Moscow, Peter the Great preferred to build an entirely new capital, in the north. So when, two months ago, in a speech inaugurating the Governor of Rome, Mussolini dramatically announced his plans for a "new Imperial Rome," Rome, and most of Italy, blinked, somewhat dazzled.

Government Considers Programs.

The five-year period within which the new Governor was ordered to effect the transformation seemed so short a time that all that prevented the project from being laughed at—behind the discreet cover of one's palms, of course—was the fact that it came from the proficient Mussolini, who has a reputation for meaning business, a capacity for getting things done. But even for Mussolini the "regulatory plan" and the pace set for its realization appeared fanciful.

Rome now has come to regard the project as practical, aside from the time limit; Mussolini has already started the cumbersome bureaucratic machinery of State to work toward accomplishing his design. In detail, the plan is still somewhat incomplete. The Government has not decided which of three or four programs advanced by leading municipal architects it will follow. Nearly every civil engineer of distinction is still busy with pencil and draft sheet. The press is filled with what the old heads call "tendenciouses" (axe-grinding) pieces, written by experts who raze streets and erect marvelous public buildings around be-palmed squares with delightful abandon. Many imaginations are busy; the Government suffers no lack of advice and suggestion.

But, despite the confusion of pencils, preliminary work has been started on clearing away the débris of centuries from some of the historic edifices and monuments. The region of the Roman Forum, which once re-echoed to the accents of the voices of Rome's great statesmen, is now ringing with the sound of hammers and the crash of falling beams. The Governor's Administration on the Campidoglio is bending to its task. One hears less about "rebuilding Rome in five years" and more about "making the city over thoroughly, in a way that will make it more habitable as well as more beautiful."

"Of course, it is not possible to rebuild Rome in five years," said Giuseppe Giovannoni, dean of the Government architects and a member of the "regulatory plan" commission. "It will take at least fifteen years to do what Mussolini proposes, possibly more. That is," he added qualifyingly, "it would under the normal course of events. According to the usual way of doing things. With Mussolini behind them, it would be possible to do things more quickly."

The main purpose is slowly to move the modern part of Rome away from the heart of that ancient monumental Rome which it is now "constricting." Areas toward the south and southeast, either open or sparsely settled, afford superior topographical inducements for industrial and commercial enterprise, and could be used to lessen the pursuit upon the sites of the classical era. Withdrawal from the zone of the ancients would leave the latter its "silent, tragic grandeur," preserving its memorials of the origin of our Western civilization.

Business Centre Improvements.

But this ideal is attainable only to a relative degree. The tentacles of modern Rome have entwined themselves too thickly in many parts of old Rome to be torn away completely. Much of what is now Rome's financial and business centre can scarcely be removed from the region of the Corso Umberto, the ancient race course, which is now lined with the solidly built offices of Italy's large banking and trading concerns. The mistake of builders in permitting the contemporary city to entrench itself upon the site of the old cannot be corrected entirely.

About all that can be done in that locality for the present is to tear away the less important buildings that now impinge upon historic edifices—the Augusteo, for instance, one of Rome's finest old theatres, is today lost in the midst of a mass of low, shabby structures—and cut a few streets through adjoining so as to relieve the narrow Corso Umberto and some other thoroughfares from part of their traffic congestion.

Other districts contain removable old, unsanitary tenements, buildings such as those in the vicinity of what is left of the grand old theatre of Marcellus, or the low, unsightly shops and tenements which crowd upon the Roman and other forums not far from the Capitoline Hill. In such regions Mussolini intends to swing his broom freely.

Will Cost Large Sum.

Officials on the Campidoglio said several billion lire had been set aside for the clearing-up process, and that "more appropriations would be forthcoming when necessary." A large share of the burden will have to be borne by the country as a whole, since Rome is the capital, a national heritage, and what restores Rome at the same time benefits Italy. [On April 18 the State advanced 90,000,000 lire to the city to initiate the main plan.]

The construction of subways in old Rome presents important engineering and archæological difficulties. Old Rome is honeycombed with subterranean passages, from the Roman Forum west. To dig a channel through this labyrinth would not only interfere with one of Rome's oldest sanctuaries, so to speak, but offer structural problems which appear insoluble.

"I doubt if old Rome will ever have a subway system like that of other capitals," Signor Giovannoni said. "Nor is the city quite ready yet, from the viewpoint of volume of population, to support a large underground system. What would be practical, however, would be underground railway and traffic passages through the Seven Hills, where the corridors would be deep enough not to intersect any of the caves."

Mussolini has suggested that steam railway traffic be swung from its present terminal to a point several

Modern Progress Touches the Roman Forum

DR. OSBORN STATES EVOLUTION'S NEW PROBLEM

Man's Spiritual Powers Are Unaccounted For by Science, Though "Refutable Evidence" of Physical Changes Are Found—Hope in Creative Evolution

IN a recent address before the students of Cornell University Dr. Osborn declared that evolution, in the accepted sense, fails to account for the spiritual qualities of man. Because of the interest aroused by that address The New York Times asked Dr. Osborn to develop the thoughts expressed there. He has done so in the following article.

By HENRY FAIRFIELD OSBORN.

IN his Presidential address before the British Association in South Africa, the late Professor Bateson so strongly felt the lack of creative impulse in the word "evolution" that he startled the world by his speculation that all the higher qualities of animal life may have resided potentially in the archaic protoplasm of the single-celled amoeba type.

I do not for a moment share a speculation which Bateson himself threw out somewhat after the quixotic manner of Bernard Shaw's utterances on evolution, but I do feel the inherent weakness in the word "evolution," which signifies to unroll or to unfold, like the unfolding of a book, and the need of the older Sanskrit "kar," signifying to make or to create; not creatio ex nihilo in the one-time theologic sense of creation out of nothing, but in the sense of new forms, qualities and potencies arising out of pre-existing material.

This is why I am beginning to use the combined words, "creative evolution," and have recently offered a new definition, namely, that evolution is a continuous creation of life fitted to a continuously changing world.

From Facts to Principles.

In the lay mind the thought at once arises, "Why, this is nothing new; we long since became familiar with it through Bergson's famous work of 1907 bearing these very words for its title." But my honored friend, Henri Bergson, advances on the deductive basis of an internal vital impulse along lines of adaptation, whereas the new basis of creative evolution begins inductively with the prolonged study of physical adaptations and ends in the interpretative generalization expressed in the words "creative evolution." Bergson advanced from principles to facts; we should advance from facts to principles.

Indirect advantages of the fundamentalist attacks that have been made during the past decade upon the whole principle of the evolution of man are the sharpening of our definitions, increase, our rapidly advancing anatomical knowledge certainly helps us on the moral, intellectual and spiritual side of the problem. If, for example, our anatomical knowledge should lend strong support to the Lamarckian principle of the physical progress of man through the transmission to offspring of adaptations acquired by the parents, this principle might help us to a readier explanation of the origins of moral, intellectual and spiritual adaptations. In fact, the now broken and discredited crutches of the Lamarckian hypothesis were those on which were built up the speculations of the philosophers Locke, Herbert Spencer and George Romanes, especially in the latter's work on "The Origin of the Human Faculty."

Man's Intuitions.

The most eminent American Lamarckian was Edward Drinker Cope, paleontologist and natural philosopher, who in 1890 summarized the origin and evolution of the human mind as follows:

> The experimental theory adopted by Locke as a statement of the history of the human mind has been shown by Herbert Spencer to be more correctly an explanation of the development of the mind of animals in general, including that of man. On this hypothesis, while it is admitted that much may be acquired by each individual human mind by experience, it is asserted that more has been acquired by the race in general, and handed down to the existing generations by inheritance.
>
> It is further held that the elements of the mind of man were not acquired by him at all, but have been derived by him by inheritance from the pre-existent members of the animal kingdom from whom he is descended. It is the qualities which are thus inherited which appear to the student who is unacquainted with this explanation of their origin to be spontaneous, or "intuitive" to the human mind. Thus the so-called intuitions of man are shown to be the organized products of the experience of preceding generations.

Perhaps no other anatomist or paleontologist has made a more broad and searching analysis of the Lamarckian hypothesis pro and con than the writer of the present article; this analysis has been based upon literally thousands of observations and measurements among fossil ancestral lines of mammals, not only of primitive and higher primates, but of four diverse and independently evolving kinds of mammals.

Starting in 1888 on the evolution of the primates, after a few months the creative principle was observed; at the time the writer was under the strong Lamarckian reaction of Darwin himself and the Lamarckian propaganda of Cope. Accordingly, these creative origins of new characters were attributed to what may be termed the "experiential hypotheses" of Lamarck, Spencer and Cope.

During the next two decades, however, every single observed fact bearing on Lamarckism was severely examined, and the writer was compelled to abandon the "experiential hypothesis" entirely, not only as inadequate but as contrary to the very principle of progressive adaptation which it was designed to explain. This is the negative conclusion as to Lamarckism finally set forth in the two great paleontological monographs, encyclopedic in size and scope, now going to press.

Origin of Spiritual Traits.

Obvious is the application to the origin of mind of this newly demonstrated creative principle in the anatomy of the lower animals and in what we know of the anatomy of man. If useful anatomical characters arise without antecedent experience, why may not useful intellectual and spiritual characters also arise without antecedent experience? If the experiential hypothesis is a demonstrated failure in anatomy, why should it not also be proved a demonstrated failure in psychology and in the origin of our intellectual and spiritual traits?

But we must not advance from the physical to the psychical side of man too hurriedly; we must not too readily assume that the same creative principle prevails in mind as in matter. Moreover, we are endeavoring to distinguish between observed facts and mere hypotheses and to begin entirely afresh along lines of creative evolution, with open minds and without preconceptions.

Favoring the possibility of a similar creative rather than experiential origin of spiritual and physical characters is one of the most important biological generalizations of the nineteenth century, namely, Weismann's principle of "the continuity of the germ-plasm" and the series of brilliant discoveries consequent upon this principle in the field of heredity up to the present moment.

The very first corollary of Weismann's principle is that all hereditary characters have a similar germinal basis throughout the entire animal and plant kingdoms; consequently, by all the accepted principles of heredity, the creative principle must be a phenomenon of heredity. Weismann's application of natural selection to the higher mental faculties is cited below.

Let us, however, first approach the creative problem along an entirely different line, namely, along the line of observed facts of the intellectual and spiritual evolution of man during the prehistoric period beginning with the Dawn Man of tertiary times and ending with those dramatic transitions in the intellectual life of man in which, entirely without antecedent experience, he suddenly emerges from nature, like Minerva from the brain of Jove, fully equipped for supreme intellectual and spiritual tests.

My own reflections along this line were first aroused by the realization of the sudden emergence of the moral, intellectual and spiritual abilities of the Cro-Magnon race, perhaps 40,000 years ago. An analogous instance is the emergence of the Achaean race of Greece from the so-called barbarians of the northern forests, a fair-haired race which in a few decades revealed a moral and intellectual supremacy not attained before or since.

Contemporary illustration of the same creative principle is the linguistic, mathematical and artistic ability displayed by youth suddenly transplanted from an uncivilized to a civilized, intellectual environment, entirely without corresponding antecedent experience.

New Attributes of the Race.

It is reflections such as these which led me to declare in the address before the students of Cornell University that the spiritual qualities of man cannot be accounted for by purely evolutionary processes, and that mathematical and artistic faculties of man may be cited as new attributes of the human race, without antecedence in experience and not to be accounted for by evolution, in the accepted sense of the term.

We accordingly observe that there is an actual parallel between the intellectual and the physical evolution of man, namely, that in both alike certain characters and qualities arise antecedent to experience. Yet both in mind and in body of man these creative characters adjust themselves to experience; they are adaptive; they fit the environment; they afford adaptive reactions to existing states. Consequently, they cannot be due to a blindly creative impulse, such as the "élan vital" of Bergson, impelling mind and matter into attributes and forms which could be of no possible service because unfitted either to the psychical or the physical environment.

An illustration of this universal quality of fitness to new conditions may be taken from the consideration of the racial evolution of man. I touched on this in my study of the life of John Burroughs, from which I may quote a few passages:

> "Whence the poet's soul, whence the soul of a race, of a people, of a nation? Have we not reason to believe that there is a racial soul as well as a racial mind, a racial system of morals, a racial anatomy? This is the thought to which I have been led in trying to penetrate to the inner meaning of the life and works of John Burroughs, because, eager as I am about anatomy, I am far more eager about the origin and development of the moral, spiritual and intellectual nature of man—the mystery of mysteries in biology at the present time. * * *
>
> "Our conclusion is that distinctive spiritual and intellectual powers originate along lines of slow racial evolution in climate and surroundings of distinct kinds. In the South were the Mediterranean lines of migration along sunny seas, formidable enough in the Winter season, favorable to rapid development of maritime powers, together with artistic powers, the Mycenaeans, the Phoenicians, the early Italian races. The Mediterraneans take nature for granted.
>
> ### Races Not Sea-Loving.
>
> "In the centre of Europe were the lines of Alpine or Celtic invaders, kept entirely away from the sea, races of agriculturalists and of miners, rich in mechanical talent, neither adventurous nor sea-loving. To the north lived a race of hunters, of seafaring adventurers, resolutely contending with the forces of nature, fond of the open, curious and inquisitive about the causes of things; deliberate in spiritual development; very gradually they reach the greatest intellectual heights and depths. * * *
>
> "It is through the reciprocal relation of the inner man and the environing world that there are so few misfits. If Bergson were right, our Western world would be full of disharmonies; we should find Mediterranean geniuses springing up in Scandinavian atmospheres, as is never the case. The racial creative spirit of man always reacts to its own historic racial environment, into the remote past. * * * If Bergson were right, we should have spiritual and intellectual genius appearing out of season and entirely out of accord with environment. * * * Racial aptitudes of the past 20,000 years are now revealed in anatomy and will be no less clearly revealed in the predispositions of morals, of intellect and of spirit."

Thus we observe a creative rise of intellectual and spiritual characters of which we have no explanation whatever, and side by side with this we place the creative rise of new anatomical characters which are equally difficult to explain. The scientific attitude is to determine whether this creative element in mental evolution is a fact, a principle so universal that it may be called a law. After this point is once settled we may search for explanations.

Meanwhile, the only tentative explanation we can offer, as a substitute for the "experiential theory," is one which was many years ago proposed simultaneously by the human psychologist, James Mark Baldwin, the comparative psychologist and philosopher, C. Lloyd Morgan, and by the present writer. Baldwin used the term "organic selection"; Morgan used the term "coincident selection." Morgan summed up his present views regarding mind in his Gifford Lecture of 1922, entitled "Emergent Evolution," a metaphysical rather than physical or experimental treatise, in which he does not allude to "coincident selection." Baldwin has not, to our knowledge, applied the principle of "organic selection" to the development of the racial mind, which, like the racial body, is eminently adapted to existing conditions of thought and of life.

The Pole Star of Evolution.

In 1896 the writer suggested "organic selection" as "a mode of evolution requiring neither natural selection nor the inheritance of acquired characters." This is a hypothesis of prolonged or secular inheritance of mental and physical predispositions which happen to coincide with the new demands and habits of life. By this means the individual choice of habit and of habitat, with men as with animals, has been the very pole star of evolution.

This choice of habit or of habitat has sometimes been optional, a matter of pleasure in choosing between two or more alternatives, and sometimes enforced. New habitats also throw all the adaptations to old habitats and habits out of balance and place new mental and physical predispositions at a premium. This Osborn-Baldwin-Morgan process of "organic" or "coincident" adaptation to new mental and physical conditions operates over very long periods of time. Every race of mammal and man thus becomes in a sense creator of its destiny, the architect of its fate.

Take a purely anatomical illustration of organic or coincident selection: By heredity men may be predisposed to arboreal, to cursorial, to terrestrial or to amphibious life. The born climbers take to the trees, the born swimmers take to the water, the born runners take to the chase. But in turn these very habits of tree life, of aquatic life, of cursorial or running life, through the process of individual modification and self-adaptation, are self-perfecting.

First Choice of Wives.

Those who attain the greatest skill and facility are naturally the most successful members of the tribe. They are the best climbers, the best fishermen, the best hunters. They are rewarded with the first choice of wives and blessed with the first crop of offspring. This is the essence of the principle of organic selection, a subsidiary principle of natural selection.

The illustration I used in 1896 was the following: If a human infant were brought up in the branches of a tree for arboreal instead of for terrestrial life, there is no doubt that all predispositions toward arboreal habit would be retained and cultivated; thus a profoundly different adult type would be produced. * * * During an enormously long period of time in which a race might select an arboreal habitat, such as that selected by the anthropoid apes, it would be possible to accumulate all physical and mental predispositions which favor arboreal life.

Weismann very cleverly applied natural selection to the higher mental faculties in the second of his famous essays on heredity (1883):

> "The sudden and yet widespread appearance of a particular talent in correspondence with the general intellectual excitement of a certain epoch points in the same direction. How many poets arose in Germany during the period of sentiment which marked the close of the last century, and how completely all poetic gifts seem to have disappeared during the Thirty Years' War! How numerous were the philosophers that appeared in the epoch which succeeded Kant; while all philosophic talent seemed to have deserted the German nation during the sway of the antagonistic 'exact science,' with its contempt for speculation.

Whence Comes Talent?

"Wherever academies are founded, there the Schwanthalers, Defreggers and Lenbachs emerge from the masses which had shown no sign of artistic endowment through long periods of time. At the present day there are many men of science who, had they lived at the time of Bürger, Uhland or Schelling, would probably have been poets or philosophers. And the man of science also cannot dispense with that mental disposition directed in a certain course, which we call talent, although the specific part of it may not be so obvious; we may, indeed, go further, and maintain that the physicist and the chemist are characterized by a combination of mental dispositions which differ from those of the botanist and the zoologist. Nevertheless, a man is not born a physicist or a botanist, and in most cases chance alone determines whether his endowments are developed in either direction."

Helpful as are Weismann's illustrations of the favoring of musical and scientific talents, neither of his explanations really touches the core of the matter of origin, which lies in the newly discovered principle of creative evolution.

Once a certain talent originates in man or beast, no one questions the accumulation and strengthening of this talent by natural selection. It is the origin of the talent which remains to be accounted for, and this is why we must still search in the field of creative evolution of both physical and intellectual qualities.

tensification of our methods of research and broadening of our field of exploration.

As to the sharpening of our definitions, we are more clearly separating what we know and what we do not know about human evolution. In the sphere of absolute knowledge and irrefutable evidence is the anatomical evolution of man. The very brilliancy of the advances along this line, especially during the past three decades, tends to illumine the fact that we have made relatively little progress along moral, intellectual and spiritual lines of human evolution and forces us to realize that the anatomical is, after all, the least human part of the whole process.

The supreme qualities which substantiate the rank that Linnaeus accorded man as a primate are not his physical but his spiritual powers, and we are only on the threshold of understanding of the modes by which the spiritual powers of man arose, gained by what we have gleaned of the fossil history of man himself and by comparison with the fossil history of other mammals.

ROYAL MATCH WOULD HEAL OLD BREACH

By MARIE MANNING.

ENGLAND looks for the official announcement of the engagement of Prince Henry, son of King George, and Lady Mary Scott, daughter of the Duke of Buccleuch, when the period of court mourning for Queen Alexandra comes to an end.

The proposed match is interesting on a number of counts. For one thing, it would carry on a current tradition of marrying at home. Both Princess Mary and the Duke of York were wedded to British subjects instead of to members of reigning Continental families. Also, both Prince Henry and Lady Mary Scott have Stuart blood in their veins, Lady Mary representing a branch that was once deposed. The alliance would mean a union of two family camps long ago engaged in bitter warfare.

In Macaulay's phrase, "every schoolboy knows" that the present royal family owes its place on the English throne to Sophia, granddaughter of James I, who married the Elector of Hanover. Sophia's grandson, George I, could neither speak nor write the English language.

Lady Mary Scott's Stuart forebears were much more romantic personages than were those of her prospective husband. He can claim the four Georges and Victoria, with bluff William I and frivolous George IV. Lady Mary's Stuart blood comes through the famous Duke of Monmouth, fourth in descent from Mary Queen of Scots. Monmouth was that adored natural son of Charles II, who after his father's death led a revolution to establish his claims to the English throne—and lost his head for his rashness. Charles always admitted the paternity of Monmouth; had him brought up under the name of Crofts, and at court put him under the protection of his favorite, Lady Castlemaine, who must have been a very quaint duenna. Monmouth's Uncle James had a different story to tell of the boy's paternity. The case represents one of the most interesting of genealogical puzzles.

Less Exalted Folk, Too.

Besides Mary Stuart, Charles I and the Duke of Monmouth, all of whom were beheaded in attempts to seize or retain possession of the English throne, less exalted folk—highly interesting characters who have injected not a little comedy into the border chronicles of Scotland—can be claimed as kin by Lady Mary Scott.

The family name of the Dukes of Buccleuch is Scott. They trace their descent back to Sir Richard le Scot, 1249-1285. Sir Walter Scott, the novelist, is also of this clan. The material from which he drew the "Lay of the Last Minstrel" was taken largely from family documents and tradition relating to a common ancestor, Sir Walter Scott of Branxholm and Buccleuch, who was a distinguished soldier of his day.

But the forebear in whom Sir Walter Scott particularly delighted, and who became the subject of a poem, was one "Muckle-mouthed Meg," the ugliest woman in Scotland. Lockhart has introduced her story into his Life of Sir Walter Scott, and Fraser relates it in his two-volume work, "The Scotts of Buccleuch." Visitors to Abbotsford will recall the lady's picture.

LADY MARY SCOTT

The novelist in his correspondence with Miss Seward in 1802 gives the following account of the romance of his embarrassingly homely ancestress:

> "I have some thought of attempting a border ballad in the comic manner, but I almost despair of bringing it well out. A certain Sir William Scott, from whom I am descended, was ill advised enough to plunder the estate of Sir Gideon Murray of Elibank, ancestor of the present Lord Elibank. The marauders were defeated, seized and brought in fetters to the Castle of Elibank, upon the Tweed. The Lady Murray was seated on the battlements and descried the return of her husband with the prisoners. She immediately inquired what her lord intended to do with young Scott of Harden.
>
> "'Hang the robber, assuredly,' was the answer of Sir Gideon.
>
> "'What,' answered the Lady, 'hang that handsome young knight of Harden, when I have three ill-favored daughters still unmarried? No, no, Sir Gideon, you will force him to marry our Meg.'"

The Fateful Decision.

Sir William received three days in which to make up his mind whether he would take Meg or be hanged. The rope almost won the day over the ill-favored bride, but with the noose actually dangling, he chose Meg of the ample mouth.

Curiously enough, tradition says the ill-assorted couple were very happy, and Scott of Harden, who did not reform with his marriage but continued to lead border forays and steal cattle wherever he could find them, found an able ally in his homely wife, who was uncommonly adept at the art of pickling the beef her husband stole.

What titles it may please his Majesty to confer upon his third son and bride has not yet been announced. Whatever they may be, titles are no novelty to the house of Buccleuch, which boasts no less than three dukedoms, the others being Queensberry and Montagu. There is also the earldom of Dalkeith and a string of lesser honors which fills a good deal of space in the peerage.

The most famous residence of the Dukes of Buccleuch is Dalkeith House, about seven miles from Edinburgh. It was built by Sir John van Brough in 1700 for Monmouth's widow, and occupies the site of a more ancient castle, which first belonged to the Grahams and then to the Douglases.

Dalkeith House has been visited by a number of English sovereigns, who have inscribed their names in the guest book and have taken a romantic interest in the Stuart relics with which the house abounds. The picture gallery possesses important examples of the old masters—canvases by Titian, Raphael, Correggio, Van Dyck. The park, which is more than 1,000 acres in extent, contains a remnant of the ancient Caledonian Forest, where are to be found the largest giant trees in the United Kingdom.

The tooth of time is abundantly evident at Dalkeith House, and it gives to the magnificent old possessions almost a pedantic air, which, compared with the glittering restoration of Blenheim and other of the English "dukeries," make it conspicuously impressive.

NAVY AGAIN WILL TRY TO LIFT SUNKEN S-51

Brings Rescue Ship From Panama to Attempt Salvage of Submarine Off Block Island—Vessel Lies in A Hundred and Thirty Feet of Water

ANOTHER effort will be made this week to raise the submarine S-51, lying in 130 feet of water off Block Island, on the Connecticut coast, with the bodies of twenty-four of her crew. She has been there nearly seven months, since the night of Sept. 25, when she was struck by the steamship City of Rome, bound from Savannah for Boston. After one minute of suspense, during which she lay helpless, careened by the water pouring through a hole three feet wide in her hull, her radio mast scraping the starboard side of the steamship, she sank swiftly. The attempt to lift her and recover the bodies of her men was stopped Dec. 5, after two-thirds of her watertight compartments had been freed by air pressure and her dead weight of 2,300 tons reduced one-half.

The suspension was forced by stormy Winter weather and inadequate equipment. Sending air through the pipes to the divers employed far under water was made so difficult and uncertain by the low temperature that the authorities would not subject the faithful men to further risks. They had already recovered the bodies of nine of the thirty-three officers and men who were drowned. Three of the full complement of six officers and thirty men had been rescued by the City of Rome before she proceeded on her way the night of the collision.

Salvaging will now be resumed in better weather, with the aid of the United States submarine rescue boat Falcon, brought from Panama for the purpose. While naval men are hopeful of results, they have before them, in grimly brief official reports, the record of the slow progress made in raising the United States submarine F-4, sunk during marine manoeuvres off Honolulu, Hawaiian Islands, March 25, 1915. That was the first submarine disaster in the United States Navy, although in foreign navies within ten years there had been seventeen such accidents involving loss of life. The F-4 carried a crew of nineteen enlisted men and two officers, all of whom perished. There are contrasts and there are resemblances in the circumstances attending the sinking of the F-4 and the S-51.

Extraordinary Diving Work.

The F-4 went down off Honolulu in the Spring, in a tropic sea, in daylight, from a cause then unknown. She was located under 305 feet of water, lying on the side of a steep and high undersea mountain, and was not raised until Aug. 29. It took more than five months of hard, perilous diving work and tugging and lifting before she was brought to the surface and towed into Honolulu Harbor. The divers had operated at unprecedented depths. Making the descent from the rescue ship in four minutes, they were able to work but twenty minutes at a time in the terrific pressure of 138 pounds to the square inch.

Then they were hoisted ten feet, stopped, drawn upward another ten feet and so on, at slow and cautious intervals; three hours were taken to bring them to the surface in order to gradually inure them to the change to the normal pressure of two pounds to the inch near the top. One diver fouled his line at 275 feet and was held there four hours. When he was extricated by the heroism of another diver it was necessary to keep him an entire day in the recompression tank. Even with that precaution he underwent a long and desperate illness from pneumonia.

Special appliances, added to the daring and skill and patience of divers and sailors, succeeded in lifting the F-4 within fifty feet of the surface when a sudden storm spoiled nearly all that had been done and forced a long wait until six pontoons had been built at Mare Island yard and cafried to Honolulu. With these the raising was completed. When the submarine was towed into Honolulu Harbor and opened, it was found impossible to identify the bodies of fourteen of the eighteen dead she held.

Three of her known crew had disappeared entirely. The bodies recovered were buried with military honors in Arlington. This, it is supposed, will be the disposition of the dead in the S-51 if she is brought up.

Inquiry Is Suspended.

The naval court of inquiry into the loss of the F-4 decided that it was caused by corroded lead linings and by defective diving qualities. The inquiry in the case of the S-51 is suspended pending examination of her interior and machinery and whatever records may be found. So far as the inquiry went it tended to place responsibility on the steamer City of Rome. The naval court heard the testimony of the City of Rome's officers and men, and examined the records and observations at New London and Block Island. These last show that the submarine had, when struck at 10:24 P. M., almost exactly completed five hours of a twelve hours' endurance run on the surface under command of Lieutenant Rodney S. Dobson.

The raising of the F-4 off Honolulu was described in the report of the Secretary of the Navy as a feat "unprecedented in the annals of any navy," involving the lifting of deadweight of 250 tons from a depth of 305 feet, a mile and half from harbor in the open sea. Whether the S-51 can be lifted from a depth of 130 feet in Block Island Sound is considered, nevertheless, uncertain. There are encouragement and discouragement in the experiences of other navies.

Troubles of Other Navies.

Because of special circumstances, one of the most notable of submarine disasters was the sinking of the Japanese No. 6 while engaged in manoeuvres in Hiroshima Bay, April 16, 1912. She was a small craft of but sixty tons, sank in only sixty feet of water and was raised in four hours. Yet all her crew of fifteen were dead. Lieutenant Sakuma, her commander, left in the conning tower a farewell letter, telling of the last moments and fine courage of his men and his own thoughts and feelings while facing death. The Japanese lost their No. 70 on Aug. 21, 1923; it sank on acceptance trial with her crew of ninety, the accident being attributed to faulty construction. Japan's No. 43 sank off Sasebo Island March 24, 1924, after collision with a battleship, forty-nine men being lost.

The British submarine H-47 went down with her crew of twenty-three while on an exercise run at Gibraltar, March 24, 1922. She had been accidentally rammed by a destroyer, sank in 500 fathoms, and never was recovered. Submarine K-22 of the British navy was sunk by collision with a British battleship Jan. 10, 1925, off Portland, carrying with her forty officers and men. By a similar accident the British K-5 was sunk in 1923, all her crew being lost.

The Italian submarine Sebastiano Vendro, commanded by Captain Vendome, who was an expert in undersea craft and navigation, disappeared Aug. 31, 1925, while engaged in diving manoeuvres off Sicily. She was found four days later under 100 feet of water, her crew of thirty-two all dead. The boat was salvaged.

Naval men say that the only appliance which can be trusted absolutely to raise promptly any submarine from any depth is owned by the German Government. It consists of travelling cranes on a superimposed steel structure on two huge hulls, one placed on each side of the object to be lifted. It is an Italian wrecking company, however, that has contracted with the Turkish Government to raise thirty-nine war-sunk vessels from the Dardanelles.

Safety Factor Improves

Records and details indicate that submarine casualties are gradually diminishing and that the United States Navy has been exceptionally fortunate in avoiding such misfortunes. It is noted, also, as an encouraging fact, that the disasters from faulty construction are lessening. Most of the losses of recent years have been from collisions.

Safety and accuracy in the navigation of undersea craft have risen high since the forerunners of all submarines, the craft built for the Confederacy, operated in Charleston Harbor against the Federal blockading squadron in the Civil War. These machines made a HYDROCOPS record of failure and reckless courage, with one suicidal success. The general idea of the Confederate submarine was a torpedo boat to be used against stationary targets, showing but slightly above the water and supposed to be available for night attacks, with a heavy charge of contact explosive at the end of a spar projecting from the bow.

Mishaps of Early Submarines.

A canoe built on this plan and propelled by six oarsmen inaugurated modern submarine warfare in 1863. She was silently nearing the United States gunboat Powhattan, on blockade duty just outside the harbor of Charleston, when she was hailed by a sentry on the Powhattan's deck. Startled by the sudden challenge, one of the oarsmen nervously backed his oar, causing his little craft to swerve so violently that her torpedo was dislocated and lost. The next attempt was on the Ironsides, then the most formidable ship in the Federal Navy. Large rewards were offered for her destruction.

A small boat, driven by steam, was sent against her one night, approached unobserved and was halted to correct direction, the Ironsides having swung wide with the tide. Then it was found that the engine of the submarine had stopped on dead centre and could not be induced to work, and she was ignominiously paddled and towed back to the wharves.

In October the David, so named because she was to slay the Goliath of the hostile navy, was built. She was fifty feet long and six feet beam, built of wood, and showed but ten inches above the surface. She exploded a hundred pounds of powder against the hull of the Ironsides, but was swamped by the mass of water thrown up falling into her own smokestack.

Superb in Quality, Supreme in Value

Clearly-defined superiority over all other cars in its class in quality and in value—that's why sales of this Special Six 4-Door Sedan are overstepping all former high marks.

Especially is this quality and value apparent in the car's brilliantly smooth and responsive performance.

The scientifically refined Special Six motor is endowed with mechanical features of the most advanced and highly efficient type. Conspicuous among these is the full-force feed lubrication system.

Full-force feed lubrication adds immeasurably to the car's smoothness by continuously immersing in a bath of oil all main bearings, connecting rod bearings and camshaft bearings. In addition it permits long periods of sustained high speed without the slightest strain or injury to the motor.

Furthermore, an oil purifier, a gasoline filter and an air cleaner increase the efficiency and long life of the engine by keeping out dust and other abrasives so harmful to smooth operation.

Finally, Nash-designed four-wheel brakes, full balloon tires and five disc wheels—all at no extra cost—typify the exceptional equipment Nash offers in this car.

BUICK Leadership

What is the most popular theatrical production in town? To see it you pay top prices and purchase tickets weeks in advance—a willing tribute to Leadership.

When Man of War ran, it cost you big money, and seats were scarce—because he had won his way to Leadership.

If you like boxing you will brave the crowd and pay premium prices to see the World's Champion—because he represents Leadership.

When the World's Series is played, prices jump and thousands of fans rush to get seats—because these games determine Leadership.

Among motor cars, Buick is an outstanding leader—proved by its unapproached sales records. Yet Buick instead of costing MORE costs you LESS.

Buick leadership in the entire automobile field above Ford prices is a positive fact, known wherever motor cars are run.

Buick has won the "Blue Ribbon" of Motordom: First place in every National Automobile Show for eight consecutive years, 1919—1920—1921—1922—1923—1924—1925—and 1926.

Buick is making a runaway race of the 1926 automobile business, not only in the discriminating Metropolitan District of New York, but all over the country. Every avenue, boulevard, street, and highway in America looks like a 1926 Buick parade. All the world loves a winner.

Leadership Means Better Buicks at Lower Prices

The best materials cost Buick less. Our overhead expense against each car is less. Greater efficiency and improved machinery have reduced the labor on Buick cars 43% since 1923. Our dealers sell so many cars that they do not require or get long discounts for trading purposes. Buick affords the most reliable transportation in the world at the lowest cost.

Leadership Allows Us to Build the Finest Engineered Car in the World Today

Leadership alone makes it possible for us to build into Buick cars such features as: the sealed chassis; triple-sealed valve-in-head motor; unit power plant; multiple-disc clutch; torque tube drive; floating rear axle and mechanically operated four-wheel brakes.

Leadership permits us to build a car equipped with Delco starter and generator; Exide battery; Fisher body; Duco finish; Chase mohair and other fine upholsteries.

These things mean $3,000 to $5,000 construction, which you will not find elsewhere at Buick prices—construction that all automobile engineers would like to build into their cars, if their volume and facilities would permit.

Leadership Makes it Possible for you to Purchase Easily and Safely

If you haven't full knowledge of automobiles, motor car merchandise is too expensive to experiment with. Your good judgment tells you to eliminate the trouble of shopping around, and to purchase a Buick. Buick offers the greatest value for price. That is why it holds the lead year in and year out.

Back of every Buick car is a permanent institution of great financial strength and permanency—managers, engineers, sales and service organizations, and employees who never forget the responsibilities of Leadership.

BURBANK WIZARDRY DUE TO GREAT SENSIBILITY

He Perceived Plant Differences and Learned to Correlate Them — Knew Little Conventional Botany — Speeded Nature Up and Got New Flavors, Odors and Colors

By VERNON KELLOGG.
National Research Council.

FOR fifty years Luther Burbank, who died a few days ago, has been one of the glories of California, one of the glories of America. Born in Massachusetts in 1849, he spent most of his youth on a farm. He got what formal education a little academy could give him, but it was on the farm that he got the education that helped him become what he became.

On the farm he lived, worked, loved plants and learned to know something of their ways. He "produced" here his first new plant, the famous Burbank potato, which he obtained through selection among Early Rose seedlings. Then, in 1875, he removed Santa Rosa the "Burbank Experimental Farms." There he experimented, produced his impressive array of "New Creations"—that was his own name for them, used on the cover pages of his occasionally printed catalogues—and there, after fifty years, he died.

Burbank has been called "the plant wizard." This name does not connote the possession of any supernatural powers or mystic manners of experimentation. It simply indicates that he possessed unusual power, amounting to genius, of perceiving plant differences and of understanding correlations among these differences; and that he was unusually bold in his experimentation, industrious and persistent in his pursuit of the particular end he had in view. He knew so little of conventional botanical science that he was not handicapped by scientific traditions and dogmatism. If these qualities and the fact that he was brilliantly successful in a kind of work not well understood by the public can be thought to constitute wizardry, then he was a wizard.

Lovable and Loving.

Burbank was a lovable and a loving man. He loved plants and children and mankind, and he attracted love for himself. He was delicate in body and spirit. He was extremely sensitive. I have seen him weep when somebody said too rough a thing to him; and also when somebody spoke too kindly to him or about him.

I sat by him one evening at a little gathering of the townspeople of Santa Rosa and of some scientific and public men from San Francisco and elsewhere, to celebrate an anniversary in his life or his achievements, and watched him weep quietly through most of the evening.

Although he lived to be seventy-seven, he was never strong physically, and his nerves were always at tension. The constant invasion of his gardens by the curious, the scientific and general admirers, while recognized by him as a tribute that demanded his appreciation, was always a heavy burden. It really interfered greatly with his work; it meant the loss of time, and wear on body and nerves. But his genius, his daring and his amazing industry overcame all obstacles. He was brilliantly successful in his work, which was of a magnitude unsurpassed by that of any other worker in his field.

I have said that he knew little of conventional botanical science. I speak about this from personal knowledge. It was my privilege to know him well and to have had special opportunities to learn of his work by observation. Indeed, I made repeated trips to Santa Rosa from my university (Stanford) for no other purpose than to try to find out what, if any, new scientific knowledge of botany and of evolutionary biology could be obtained from Burbank's records and his informal accounts of his experimentation. There was little to be found.

Not Technical But Practical.

One of the principal reasons for this was that Burbank was not trying to conduct scientific experiments; he was trying to produce useful new plant kinds by any and all means that might contribute to this end. He used importation, changes of environment, selection, hybridization; anything to find or produce the needed initial variations to give him a handle for producing his "new creations." He kept the promising new variations; he threw away those of no promise for his special use.

In his "New Creations" catalogue of 1894 there is a reproduction of a photograph showing "a simple pile of brush 12 feet wide, 14 feet high and 22 feet long, containing 45,000 two and three year old seedling berry bushes (40,000 blackberry-raspberry hybrids), and 25,000 shaffer Gregg hybrids), all dug up to be burned with their crop of ripening berries. . . . Of the 40,000 blackberry-raspberry hybrids of this kind, 'Primogenial' is the only one now in existence. From the other 25,000 hybrids two dozen bushes were reserved for further trial."

That will give the reader some idea of the extent of the work done by Burbank to produce a single satisfactory new race of berries. It will also indicate the amount of "scientific data" that Burbank sent up in flames and smoke so as to keep his garden and his mind clear for the undistracted pursuit of his goal. But this was the kind of thing that made scientific men despair when they learned of it. And it is the kind of thing that induced the Carnegie Institution of Washington to make an arrangement with Burbank in 1905 whereby he was to receive a subvention of $10,000 a year for ten years, with the provision that he was to permit a scientific expert to come and go in the garden with him and to have full knowledge of all his experimenting and free access to all of his records.

His Processes Classified.

Burbank welcomed this arrangement at the time it was made, but as any one who knew Burbank and his methods and aims well could have prophesied, the arrangement became an impossible one both to Burbank and to the scientific expert and was, therefore, terminated by mutual consent after five years of trial. Burbank did not even speak or understand the language of the scientific botanist. And the scientific botanist probably never realized that Burbank really didn't care to.

Certain generalizations of distinct scientific value can be drawn, however, from a careful consideration and analysis of Burbank's methods of work. We may roughly classify his processes and means.

First—There was the importation from foreign countries, through many correspondents, of a host of various kinds of plants, some of economic value in their native land and some not, any of which, however, grown under different conditions here might prove specially vigorous or prolific or hardy, or show other desirable changes or new useful qualities.

Second—The production of variations, abundant and extreme, by various methods, as (a) the growing under new and, usually, more favorable environment (food supply, water, temperature, light, space, &c.) of various wild or cultivated forms, and (b) by hybridizations between forms closely related, less closely related and, finally, as dissimilar as may be (but producing sterility). This hybridizing was often immensely complicated by multiplying crosses, i. e., the offspring from one cross being immediately crossed with a third form, and the offspring of this with still another form and so on.

Unsettling Heredity.

These hybridizations were made sometimes with very little reference to the actual useful characteristics of the crossed parents, with the primary intention of producing an unsettling or instability in the heredity; that is, of causing, as Burbank some times said, "perturbations" in the plants, so as to get just as wide and as large variation as possible. Other crosses were made, of course, in the deliberate attempt to blend, or add together, two desirable characteristics, each possessed by only one of the crossed forms. Some crosses were made in the attempt to extinguish an undesirable characteristic.

Third—There was always, immediately after the unusual production of variations, the recognition of desirable modifications and the intelligent and effective selection of them. Thus he would save those plants to produce seed or cuttings which showed the desirable variations, and would discard all the others. In Burbank's gardens the few tenderly cared for little potted plants or carefully grafted seedlings represented the surviving fittest, and the great bonfires of scores of thousands of uprooted others, the waste in this close adaptery of Darwin and Spencer's struggle and survival in nature.

It was precisely in this double process of the recognition and selection of desirable variations that Burbank's genius came into particular play. Right here he brought something to bear on his work that few other men have been able to bring. It was the extraordinary keenness of perception, the delicacy of recognition of desirable variations in their (usually) small and to most men imperceptible beginnings.

Keen of Scent, Sight, Feeling.

Was it a fragrance that was sought? To Burbank, crawling around on hands and knees, in a bed of hundreds of seedlings, scores of the odors of the plant kingdom were arising and mingling from the fresh green leaves, but each, mind you, from a certain single seedling or perhaps from a similar pair or trio. But to you or to me, until the master-prover pointed out two or three of the more dominant single odors, the impression on the olfactories was simply that of one soft elusive fragrance of fresh green leaves.

Similarly Burbank was a master at seeing, and a master at feeling. Besides, he had his own unique knowledge of correlations. Did this plum seedling have leaves infinitesimally plumper, smoother or stronger, or with more even margins and stronger petiole or what not else, than any other among a thousand similar childish trees? Then it was saved, for it would bear a larger, or a sweeter, or a firmer sort of plum, or more plums than the others. So to the bonfires with the others, and to the company of the elect with this "fittest" one.

Now this recognition, this knowledge of correlations in plant structure, born of the exercise of a genius for perceiving through fifty years of opportunity for testing and perfecting it, was perhaps the most important single thing which Burbank brought to his work that other men do not bring (at least in such unusual degree of reliability). Industry, concentration, and single-mindedness, deftness in manipulation, fertility in practical resource, had Burbank—and so have numerous other breeders and experimenters. But in his perception of variability in its dawning, his recognition of its possibilities of outcome, and in his scientific knowledge of correlations is knowledge that is real, for it was one that was relied on and built on, and was at the very foundation of its success), Burbank had an advantage of true scientific character over his fellow-workers.

Saved Time by Grafting.

But let us follow our saved plum seedling. Have we now to wait the six or seven years before a plum tree comes into bearing to know by actual seeing and testing what new sort of plum we have? No, for this saved seedling and other similar saved ones (from the examination of 20,000 seedlings, say, Burbank would find a few tens or even scores in which he had faith of reward) would be taken from their plots and grafted on to the sturdy branches of some full-grown vigorous plum tree, so that in the next season or second next our seedling stem would have borne its flowers and fruits.

Here were years saved. Twenty, forty, sixty, different seedlings grafted on to one strong tree (in a particular instance Burbank had 600 plum grafts on a single tree!); and each seedling-stem certain to bear its own kind of leaf and flower, and fruit. For we have long known that the scion is not materially influenced by the stock nor the stock by the scion; that is, not modified radically, although grafting sometimes increases or otherwise modifies the vigor of growth and the extent of the root system of the stock.

If now the fruit from our variant seedling scion is sufficiently desirable; if it produces earlier or later, sweeter or larger, firmer or more abundant, plums, we have a new race of plums, a "new creation" to go into that thin catalogue of results. For by simply subdividing the wood of the new branch—that is, making new grafts from it—the new plum can be perpetuated and increased at will. Simple, is it not? No, it is anything but that in the reality of doing it; but in the scientific aspects of it, easily understandable.

Grafts Grow Truer Than Seeds.

Perhaps it may not be amiss to call attention to what must be familiar to most of us, and that is the fact that many (probably most) cultivated plants must be reproduced by division, that is, by cuttings, buds or grafts, and not by seeds, in order to grow "true."

An astonishing result of the hybridization between the black walnut, Juglans nigra, used as the pistillate parent, and the California walnut, J. californica, staminate parent, are walnut trees which grow with such an amazing vigor and rapidity that they increase in size at least twice as fast as the combined growth of both parents.

Many tremendous growers were got in the first generation, but in the second there were included some of the most rapidly growing trees, perhaps, in the world. This hybrid has clean-cut, glossy bright green leaves from two to three feet long with a sweet odor like that of apples, but it produces few nuts. Curiously enough the results of hybridization by using the pollen of nigra on pistils of californica produces in abundance large nuts of a quality superior to that possessed by either parent.

Two of the most elaborate of Burbank's undertakings, begun in his early days in California and carried on through his whole half century there, were his work on plums and prunes and on berries resulting in the production of a long series of new varieties. The Bartlett plum, cross of the bitter Chinese simoni and the Delaware, itself a simoni hybrid, has the fragrance and flavor of the Bartlett pear.

The Climax, a successful shipping plum, is also a cross of the simoni and the Japanese triflora. This Chinese simoni produces almost no pollen, but few grains of it ever having been obtained. But these few grains enabled Burbank to revolutionize the whole plum shipping industry. In his work on hybridizing berries he used forty different kinds of dewberries, blackberries and raspberries and he produced a score of new commercial varieties.

Why He Couldn't Get Rich.

Many will ask if Burbank did not, or could not, make a great deal of money from his plant creations. The answer is, he did not and, in fact, could not. He could get a fairly good price from the nurserymen for his single sale of the new plum or berry or flower, and the nurseryman could sell the offspring, or the grafts from the new creation, for a season or two—and then the control was gone. Reproduction and distribution of the new thing were now possible to any of the buyers they could themselves sell or give away all the specimens of the new thing they cared to.

So Burbank never made more than a comfortable simple living from his extraordinary work. But that was all he cared to make. Various attempts, by friendly or self-interested business men, to make his work reap larger returns all resulted only in troubles for him and were put aside.

Often Misrepresented.

Plant breeding is a science and an art many centuries old, and there have been many distinguished plant breeders, although but few of them have been known to the public. Scientists and horticulturists, however, have known and esteemed them, and the sudden popular fame of Burbank resulted in some hurt feelings on the part of other plant breeders. Some of Burbank's new things, also, which had been produced under California's special climatic conditions did not hold up well under the more rigorous climate of the Northern and Eastern States to which they were brought by nurserymen, and something of a reaction set in among popular writers. This even went so far as to result in including the word "faker" in articles about Burbank.

Now, Burbank was never in the slightest degree a faker, but some of the stories about him and his work lent color to the charge. Burbank was bewildered and inexpressibly hurt by these criticisms. He could not understand them and he did not know how to combat them. So he suffered in silence.

Later, however, after the first wave of superlative praise and the backwash of unfair criticism had passed, a more understanding and solidly founded appreciation, both professional and popular, replaced them. The sudden flare of attention attracted to him just before he died because of his honest and bold declarations of religious belief—or unbelief—need not concern us here.

A Record Made a Verdict Rendered

Here is a record to make you pause:

70,599 Dodge Brothers Motor Cars and Graham Brothers Trucks sold in the United States from January 2nd to April 3rd, 1926!

The greatest quarter in the company's history.

37 per cent greater than the same period last year, when 51,318 units were sold.

This record was a foregone conclusion. Since the first of the year demand increased week by week.

Each period showed greater sales than the one preceding and greater than the same period of 1925.

During the last week recorded, ending April 3rd, 9,104 units were sold, against 6,530 for the best week last year—a gain of 39 per cent.

Sales figures are an index to the buyer's preference.

Buyer's preference, these days, springs from clean-cut convictions on quality and comparative worth, penny for penny.

It is inspired by a careful appraisal of such advantages as the greater safety of Dodge Brothers all steel bodies—

The wealth of Chrome Vanadium Steel employed in the manufacture of these cars—

Their low initial cost, thanks to huge production created by demand—

Their long life and high re-sale value.

On this basis the logical preference is for Dodge Brothers Motor Cars.

Although the peak of the selling season has not yet been reached, the verdict has already been rendered.

MENACE OF ICE BRINGS NEW SCIENCE TO FORE

Light and Heat From Action of Chemicals Are Used Successfully in Combating River Jams—Peril of Bergs in Atlantic May Be Reduced

ICE engineering came into national prominence a few weeks ago when Professor Howard T. Barnes saved Oil City and Franklin, Pa., from disastrous floods by melting an ice jam on the Allegheny River with a new substance called thermite. Professor Barnes has studied ice and the methods of protecting civilization from its depredations for more than thirty years. This Summer he will accompany the University of Michigan Expedition to Greenland in an attempt to eliminate the danger of icebergs to transatlantic shipping. In the following article Professor Barnes describes the purpose and methods of ice engineering.

By HOWARD T. BARNES,
Professor of Physics, McGill University.

No one thing has modified the human race so fundamentally as has ice. Undoubtedly many traits of character are tributable to the great fight of mankind against exhaustion during the various ice ages. From such has come an unconscious regard for ice as unassailable and impregnable. On the other hand, all living matter is attracted to and seeks water, without which it could not exist. In the economy of nature ice has no part, and during the time of its formation everything tends to preserve water in its liquid form. Ice is the lifeless corpse of water, stifling and destroying it as a white plague.

Ice as a surface formation on our waterways can completely mask the living stream underneath. The human mind grasps, mostly, what it sees—which has resulted in an overestimate always of natural phenomena, tending toward a lack of courage to attempt remedial work on a large scale. The sentiment expressed by the words "leave it to nature" breeds a wholly unwarranted fear and distrust of her. Nature's notebooks are always open for us to read, and she endeavors to help us when we learn to further her plan.

Nowhere can we find a more wonderful example of the delicate poising of natural forces than in the balance between water and ice. Coexistent only at the freezing point, the passage of one into the other is dependent on a transfer of heat across a temperature boundary so minute that it is measured in thousandths of a degree. The difference between ice tightly solidified and ice loosened and soft may be only this small fraction, and the large latent heat of water tends always to maintain the mixture at 32 degrees Fahrenheit.

Heat Most Important.

When all things physical are studied in their relation to ice-fighting, the factors sift down to heat as the most important agency. To render heat most effective it must be applied at as high a temperature as possible. In order to imitate the rays of the sun as far as can be done, heat energy must be spread over a large area where sunlight cannot reach, and when sunlight is not acting.

Low temperature sources of heat, such as steam or hot water and applied electrical energy, are purely local in action and depend on convection currents and stream lines in the water to spread.

In order to provide a suitable radiation or beam of energy of sufficent power to disrupt ice, I have made use of the intensive exothermic reaction from burning aluminum. Under this reaction a rapid elevation of temperature to 5,000 degrees Fahrenheit is brought about in a few seconds, and this heat is driven into the ice in the form of short infra-red rays with light waves, which penetrate for many yards before becoming absorbed. The passage of this heat radiation leaves in its track portions of the energy to unbind the forces of freezing between the crystals of ice.

The mass thus treated becomes honeycombed and loosened, and being under the ice cover, never freezes together again. Immediately after the reaction, the molecules directly in the path of the energy are broken into their atoms, and burn with a bright flame. An explosion ensues, resembling a slow heave under the ice cover, which is an ideal condition for lifting up and dislodging the ice accumulations below the water line.

The Ice Flies to Pieces.

This appears to be a new type of explosion, and much has yet to be learned regarding it. It is caused by the ice itself flying to pieces, not by the exploding of the material developing the high temperature. We know, however, that it is very powerful in its action, and much more effective than any other explosive. The engineering features of this new method for the heat treatment of ice were worked out for the first time during the Winter of 1925, while I was engaged in studying ice conditions in the international section of the St. Lawrence River for the Hydro-Electric Power Commission of Ontario.

As a means for producing the intense heat reaction, thermit was used, which has been known in the trade for many years and chiefly used for welding and for regeneration in foundry practice. Aluminum-iron or other oxide mixtures can be used, but at the present time an ice-burning thermit is being developed that will combine low cost with speed of reaction and maximum temperature.

There is no danger from thermit in itself, as no ordinary fire will set it off. Its own reaction is entirely self-contained and will proceed in a vacuum or a closed space as efficiently as in air. The after-effects of a charge in a mass of ice over a water course work on indefinitely, for the intense heat produces a disruptive action on the under side of the ice cover and the pack ice heaves and shakes throughout its mass from shore to shore. After the reaction has subsided the flowing water seeps into crevices and cracks and sets up erosive action, which continues to disintegrate the ice for many hundreds of feet.

The Wound Remains.

The whole effect is similar to the spread of a point of infection from a wound. This ice wound never heals, even though the surface may become frozen over again during cold weather. Skill and judgment are required in placing these "heat mines" in an ice jam—otherwise they would not be effective. While working on the ice packs in the St. Lawrence River we found the engineering feature comparatively simple. An ice jam at Waddington, N. Y., and later a very large jam at Chimney Island, below Ogdensburg, N. Y., were successfully removed by the application of heat at key points.

During the present season I was called to Pennsylvania to treat the great ice gorge on the Allegheny River, which extended for twenty-four miles from above Oil City to Brandon. Such a heavy pack had never before formed in the history of these communities, and there was nothing to guide me as to the nature of the ice. It was necessary, therefore, to make a survey of the various individual jams that had worked into one another and shoved so as to erect great mounds and packs in the shallow portions at different points.

The winding character of the river bed rendered the packing more secure. During the first part of the study and treatment the weather remained exceedingly cold and it was found impracticable to send large quantities of ice downstream without creating jams lower down.

Channels Under the Ice.

The engineering feature of this work required most careful study. While at first no apparent change occurred in the outward appearance of the gorge, the river channels under the ice were opened and enlarged by placing heat mines at the key points. No attempt was made at first to treat the upper half of the gorge, as I feared this part that was being weakened day by day by the sun on the open water above Oil City might move down on the lower gorge and damage the City of Franklin.

These first operations were highly successful and reduced the flood level at Franklin by four and a half feet. As soon as mild weather set in great portions of the jam moved out wherever the heat mines had been placed and clear channels were opened in preparation for the passing out of the upper part of the pack. Two days before the final clearing of the ice portions of the upper gorge above Oil City moved down under the action of the warm water and shoved into the pack between Oil City and Franklin at Reno, thereby raising the level of the water at Oil City and causing a flood. This was relieved the next morning by opening the channel through this pack by means of heat mines.

The Final Attack.

On the following day simultaneous attack was made by the application of heat mines on the remaining portion of the gorge below Franklin and on the upper part at Reno. In order to save the traffic bridge at Reno the level of the ice was dropped with preliminary treatment to what was considered a safe distance beneath the under structure. Then the final attack was effected by placing large charges of thermit so as to cause the ice to move out from the lower and first, a clear channel having been cleared below for the masses broken away by additional charges as the work progressed upstream.

The whole of the great gorge was moving downstream without damage of any kind by 5 o'clock on the day of the final attack. The river levels dropped immediately to normal, and by the following morning there was practically no ice left in the river.

It must be borne in mind that the engineering feature of this work will not necessarily be the same in other localities. The general plan of attack, however—that of starting downstream, which completely reverses the process of nature—must be followed in order to avoid flooding and damage along the shores. In all such rivers preventive measures should be taken to avoid great accumulations. It would have been much easier to treat this gorge a few weeks earlier.

Avoiding and Relieving.

Other ice engineering features embody the treatment of rivers in order to conserve the heat supply in the water to avoid ice formation; the relieving of ice masses in waterworks and power canals, penstocks and gates—all of which have been successfully accomplished with heat mines.

Besides the use of thermit, other means of ice control can be used, such as dynamite, black powder, calcium chloride and cinders for rotting the surface. Calcium carbide possesses great heat-producing properties, but as yet has not been developed in ice practice.

The control of ice pressure on concrete structures and the disintegration of ice and snow masses can be successfully accomplished. Pressure of ice floes on bridge piers, ice friction for both wind and water and many of the physical properties of ice have yet to be accurately tabulated.

Improvement Expected.

It may be said that the result of the application of methods of ice engineering will contribute immensely to the saving of lives and property, thus adding to the comfort of mankind. The more efficient development of water power, to a degree that can hardly be estimated, will also follow, besides the better handling of snow and ice in cities and in railway operation. The loss to automobiles alone due to Winter conditions runs to millions of dollars each year.

While we do not expect entirely to cure these conditions, we may reasonably expect that scientific study by men trained in ice work can improve matters. We have only to look back through the last thirty years to see what great improvements have been brought about in Winter transportation and in the handling of ice and snow in big cities. The figures representing the price we pay each year for ice and snow run into billions of dollars. We hope to save a fraction of this.

Thousands of rivers in Canada and in the northern part of the United States go into flood each year owing to ice conditions that can be prevented. A definite advance has been made within the last two years not only in the saving of property, but—what is more important—in the saving of human life as well.

CATERPILLAR CLEVER IN HOUSING WORK

WE frequently note cleverness in dogs, cats or birds, but overlook the cleverness of caterpillars. The large, ugly caterpillar that feeds upon the compound leaves of the ailanthus tree, sometimes called the Tree of Heaven, is very much awake to the fact that he is laboring under worse conditions than his neighbor across the way who has chosen the tulip tree or the wild cherry, it was said recently by a member of the staff of the New York Botanical Garden.

Preparing to spin his cocoon, the caterpillar, after firmly fastening the leaflet in which he will eventually take his long nap, travels back and forth, sometimes over a distance of eighteen inches, to secure the main leaf stalk to a branch, so that no matter how wildly the winds of Winter may blow, his particular leaf will not drop off with the other leaves of the tree.

COLOR BLINDNESS IS CLOSELY STUDIED

RECENT studies of color-blindness indicate that it is hereditary and due to a defect in the central nervous system. This particular idiosyncrasy has long baffled those who have attempted to ascertain its causes. It occurs oftener among boys and men than among girls and women, but persons interested in the subject have found that what has been termed color-blindness in boys is frequently only color ignorance. As a corrective, special attention is now being given in connection with the art in the public schools to developing a color sense among all pupils.

"Often," reports a teacher of art in one of the largest schools in the State of New Jersey, "boys and girls have been taught to recognize and name the cardinal colors, but instruction has gone no further. I am convinced that a child's instinct for color appreciation can be increased and directed, with consequences helpful to the artistic standards of the country, within a generation."

Statistics gathered in respect to color-blind persons seem to demonstrate that color-blind men do not transmit their defect to their daughters, but through their daughters to one-half of their male grandchildren. Color-blind sons are said to inherit the defect only from their mothers.

When Rouge Looks Green.

In a group of 12,134 white children between the ages of six and sixteen from New York, Delaware, Indiana, Maryland and South Carolina 1.16 per cent. were found defective in color sense. Formerly these children would have been listed at once as color-blind. Careful study of their defects shows that many of them could detect one of two colors. Whether such defects can be remedied is debatable.

A woman married to a color-blind man recently appealed to an art teacher in the public school of her community to know whether her husband's defect could be remedied by instruction.

"When he should see red, he sees green," she explained. "So that when I put a touch of rouge on my face he asked me why I have turned a sickly green. I wish something could be done to cure him."

VIRGINIA OPENS A TREASURE HUNT

State Is Ready With $500,000 to Redeem Missing Old Time Bonds—Search of Garrets Advised Here and in Britain

RICHMOND, VA.

THERE is a treasure chest of more than half a million dollars in gold, or rather in gold bonds, in this country, and there is no reason why those who are devoting their energies to chasing the will-o'-the-wisp of fortune should not dig down into old trunks and other receptacles of family papers and find out if they are entitled to share in this large sum of money.

Those who are entitled to participate in this chest of gold will not have to employ attorneys to prosecute their claims, nor will they have to make an examination of genealogical records. If they find a document bearing the title "West Virginia Certificate" the chances are 1,000 to 1 that by presenting this certificate of Rosewell Page, Second Auditor of the Commonwealth of Virginia, they will receive in return West Virginia 3½ per cent. gold bonds, bearing coupons from Jan. 1, 1919.

Mr. Page says that there are outstanding, unclaimed, more than $500,000 of these certificates, the redemption of which was provided for in the Virginia-West Virginia debt settlement. Approximately $100,000 of these certificates were issued to persons in Great Britain and Ireland, the remaining $400,000 and more to persons in the United States. No payments will be made except on surrender of the certificates. Therefore it is useless for persons to make claims on any other basis.

Treasure Hunt Advised.

The certificates bear dates of 1871, 1879, 1882 and 1892. Some of them may have gone down with ships at sea. More probably were destroyed by fires which consumed residences. But it is believed that the major portion of the certificates are in existence now—perhaps hidden away in old escritoires, hair trunks and attics. Because they were of little value at one time their owners do not realize that today they are so much gold.

An opportunity for the people to indulge in a veritable treasure-hunt game is here furnished. Garrets should be ransacked and all family papers scrutinized. The prosecution of these claims supported by the certificates themselves cannot entail loss to any individual. It is not like bringing suit for a share in an old estate. The bonds to redeem these certificates have been issued. They await only the reception of the documents to be issued in exchange.

The history of this transaction discloses the successful effort of a State to redeem its credit. Before the secession of West Virginia from Virginia at the opening of the war between the States, the mother State had issued bonds and owed approximately $35,000,000, covering money expended for navigation companies, plank road companies, turnpike companies, bridge companies, State roads, railroad companies and State defense. Virginia claimed that West Virginia should pay a third of this debt, as that section of the old State had received a third of the benefits of the bonds issued. West Virginia denied the claim.

State Redeeming Credit.

For a long time the bonds went unpaid, and the debt with interest went to $45,000,000. Finally, on the dates already mentioned, Virginia passed a series of refunding acts, and gave to the old bondholders Virginia bonds for two-thirds of the amounts due them. In addition she gave them, for the remaining one-third, certificates stating that West Virginia owed them the remaining third. These are the "West Virginia Certificates."

West Virginia laughed at the idea of Virginia issuing "West Virginia Certificates." Of such little value were these certificates considered that many of them were sold for 10 cents per hundred and less. Finally, for the benefit of the bond and certificate holders, Virginia sued West Virginia, and in decisions rendered by the Supreme Court of the United States on March 6, 1911, and June 14, 1915, Virginia was awarded judgment against West Virginia for $12,393,929.50 with interest at 5 per cent. from July 1, 1915.

West Virginia settled the debt and interest in 1919, paying $1,062,867.16 in cash and $13,500,000 in gold bonds. Of these bonds $1,133,500 were held "in escrow" by West Virginia to pay certificates that had not been presented. More than $500,000 of this sum has not yet been claimed. Holders of the outstanding certificates may present them to Mr. Page, who will then see that they are redeemed by West Virginia. The rate of exchange per date of issue is as follows: 1871, 91.11; 1879, 88.07; 1882, 76.25; 1892, 68.22.

RAILWAY COMPARISONS

THE United States has today more than one-third, and the Western Hemisphere more than one-half of the total railway mileage of the world. There are more than 250,000 miles of railroads in the United States, 39,000 in Canada, 22,000 in Argentina, 17,000 in Brazil, 35,000 in Germany, 33,000 in France, 42,000 in Russia, 37,000 in India, 26,000 in Australia and 25,000 in the United Kingdom.

Ford

Highest in Quality Lowest in Price

The finest steels available are used in the manufacture of Ford cars. The plate glass for windshields and windows is as perfect as can be made. Upholstery material contains a larger percentage of wool than is ordinarily specified — even for much higher priced cars. The basic features of Ford design have never been improved upon by any manufacturer.

No other car offers greater dependability. The Ford car has won the favor of millions of users, under every conceivable motoring condition. Its convenience is known and appreciated the world over; its performance is taken for granted.

Such quality is possible at Ford prices because every operation, from mining of ore to final assembly is under direct control of the Ford Motor Company.

Iron is taken from Ford mines in Michigan; coal from the Company's mines in Kentucky and West Virginia. Glass comes from Ford glass plants; wood from the Ford timber tracts in the North. Raw materials and finished products are carried over the Company's own transportation routes; coke ovens, blast furnaces, a steel mill, foundries and saw mills — all are part of this complete organization. There are even salvage plants, paper mill, cement plant, etc., to transform waste materials into useful by-products.

In this way every possible economy is effected. Under no other circumstances could Ford quality be had at Ford prices.

Features That Maintain Ford Leadership

All-Steel Bodies Built entirely of steel to provide maximum safety and service, the bodies of Ford cars are as carefully manufactured as the Ford engine and chassis. All panels are stamped from twenty-four gauge steel. Body lines are pleasing, while attractive color combinations enhance the beauty of the various models.

Planetary Transmission The Ford planetary transmission is the ideal speed control for a light car. Gives complete control through foot pedals and leaves the driver's hands free to manipulate the steering wheel. Impossible to clash gears. Costs more to build than the conventional sliding gear type but is used because of its superiority.

Torque Tube Drive Henry Ford originated the Torque Tube in 1903. By use of this construction the rear spring does not take any of the driving thrust and is free to act solely as a flexible support for the car body.

Dual Ignition System (1) The Ford magneto and (2) the generator and storage battery. Even in sections where there is no battery service, the Ford owner may use his car without interruption — the magneto making him independent of battery current. Elimination of the magneto would reduce production costs—but Ford standards specify the additional value.

Thermo-Syphon Cooling Circulation of water is entirely governed by engine temperature. There is no water pump requiring frequent need for packing. Hence Ford cooling system is exceedingly simple and always efficient.

Simple, Dependable Lubrication
The Ford lubricating system is extremely simple and efficient. Combining the splash principle with gravity flow, it does not require any pump. Practically all of the parts of the engine and transmission are oiled from one oil reservoir in the crankcase.

Three Point Motor Suspension
First used by Henry Ford in 1908 and a feature of the Model T power plant for eighteen years.

Multiple Disc-in-Oil Clutch
Generally conceded among engineers to be the best, the smoothest and the most reliable for any car. The Ford clutch has the further advantage in operating in a bath of oil. This assures smooth, silent action and long life.

TWENTY-TWO YEARS OF LEADERSHIP

FEMINISM IN GERMANY LOSES ITS MATRIARCH

With Ottilie Hoffmann Passes the Most Outstanding Figure In Country's Woman's Movement—Fought Not for Sex Rights But for Economic Independence

By HERMAN G. SCHEFFAUER.

BERLIN.

GERMANY'S oldest, most matriarchal figure in the Pantheon of German woman-leaders has passed away—Ottilie Hoffmann of Bremen. She was born in 1835 in the days of the early Victorian period. England had just extended male suffrage and the only references to woman's rights were pale reflections of the blue-stocking period of Byronic days, or faint continental echoes of Mary Wollstonecraft's campaigns and pronunciamentos in the stony-hearted and utterly masculine England at the close of the eighteenth century—with possibly a dim transatlantic flash from the writings or speeches of Margaret Fuller. The audacious example of George Sand and the sentiments of George Eliot had found little response in the more conservative German woman—who regarded the issue not as one against the prerogatives of man, but as a complement of these.

The whole movement in Germany was bound up with many metaphysical and philosophical tenets. It was in fact, as a leading German feminist puts it, a movement for the "formation and participation of the innermost essence of woman's being as a contrast and as the necessary complement of the masculine nature." The frontal attack upon man himself, the deep psychological and elemental sex-hatred, the Puritanic asceticism that strove to chastise or imprison or repress masculine liberty, has never been conspicuous in Germany.

The time might have come when the belligerent German frau und fräulein would have smashed plate-glass shop-windows, poured acid into post boxes, assaulted policemen, chained themselves to the railings of the Reichstag galleries and incited all the sisterhood to direct action—had it not been anticipated by the German Revolution, which dropped all the ripe plums of privilege at one convulsive twist of the tree of State into the laps of German women.

Revolution's Prophetess.

The prophetess of Germany's stormiest revolutionary days was Rosa Luxemburg, the female counterpart of Karl Liebknecht—Red Rosa, strong featured, thick-set, with a poet's soul and a fierce humanitarianism. In January, 1919, she was flung into a cab by a group of young officers, shot and then pitched into the Spree Canal in the Tiergarten. But Red Rosa's activities were not actually a part of the woman's movement in Germany, but of the revolutionary proletarian movement — international, pacifistic and communistic.

The leading German champion of feministic demands and ideals is Dr. Gertrud Bäumer, a member of the Reichstag. Another prominent personality in the world of sex and suffrage is Dr. Helene Stöcker, whose persistent cry is for greater sex liberty, for motherhood reforms and birth control. These demands the needs and social conditions of present-day Germany have already, for good or for evil, granted in a considerable measure. Here, too, the inevitable tendency is not to restrain masculine libertinism, but to open the doors to a feminine participation in this libertinism.

The great sacrificial fight which was carried on by Ottilie Hoffmann was not for sex rights, and only in a distinct relation was it a battle for the political rights of women. Her greatest, most persistent and organized efforts were devoted in the main to the protection of women and children from the dangers of alcoholism on the part of men and in making them economically more independent of men. Her first labors on behalf of women dated back to 1867, when she worked in cooperation with Luise Otto-Peters and Auguste Schmidt.

Ottilie Hoffmann's Work.

At that time she founded the woman's Economic and Educational Society in Bremen, and brought many new and fruitful ideas to bear upon women's lives and activities. In 1894 she founded the League of German Women's Societies, and began a systematic campaign for the suffrage rights of women, a mission she combined with her anti-alcoholic war, her agitation for model public milk booths, temperance eating houses and coffee places, all in the sign of the White Bow—an abstinence society which she affiliated with the International Women's Temperance League.

As a girl of 17 she had been an instructor in the family of Lord and Lady Carlisle. Lady Carlisle was the Chairman of the British Women's Temperance Association and all her life long Ottilie Hoffmann remained in active cooperation with her and her two daughters, Lady Mary Murray and Lady Cecilia Roberts. In 1894 she established the Society of the Blue Cross in conjunction with Lieut. Col. von Knobelsdorff. From 1895 on, at the suggestion of Frances Willard, she had been the Chairman of the German branch of the Women's Temperance League—a position she resigned in 1912 to Gustel von Blücher.

Her death was the last of the other famous German woman leaders, Minna Cauer, died at an advanced age. A short time before her death the gifted Frau Dr. Levy-Rathenau, a cousin of the distinguished scholar and politician, Walter Rathenau, who fell by assassination, had also died—at the age of 45. The few remaining champions of the days before the great liberation, such as the venerable Helene Lange, are revered as leaders of a movement which, owing to the opposition of German masculinity, had often come to a standstill.

EINSTEIN ON GREATNESS.

PROFESSOR ALBERT EINSTEIN of relativity fame is quoted in a recent interview as saying: "Why do people speak of great men in terms of nationality? Great Germans, great Englishmen? Goethe always protested against being called a German poet. Great men are simply men and are not to be considered from the point of view of nationality, nor should the environment in which they were brought up be taken into account."

Gift From Socialism.

In America women held their earliest suffrage convention the next year at Worcester, Mass. In Germany the wave of reaction buried the woman's movement for a long period. Luise Otto-Peters, still aflame with revolutionary fire and hungry for liberation, continued the fight, and her comrade in arms was the brilliant Auguste Schmidt, a woman of immense spiritual force and with a superb oratorical gift. In 1865 they founded the General Society of German Women. Celebrating its sixtieth anniversary recently in Meissen, the city of porcelain and the birthplace of Luise Otto-Peters, the society renamed itself. It became the League of German Women Citizens—a change significant of a still greater change.

For at one blow, through the overthrow of monarchy, German women had attained political, social and economic rights and liberties. The political program of the socialistic Government had provided them with these, and they are anchored in the new republic's Constitution.

Slow to Use Rights.

The use made of these rights is, to be sure, not yet conspicuous. For the German woman, in things political, is but a smaller and feebler edition of the German man, whose political incapacity has always been tragically evident. It is now, after this sudden and unexpected victory, that the names of the earlier champions of women's political emancipation begin to shine with the lustre of retrospective battles and martyrdoms, and the women's clubs and societies of Germany invest their names and their memories with something hallowed and historical.

Their names, which were as battle-cries for the small, resolute minorities, are now drawing a larger homage from the younger generation of German women.

It is only a short time ago that one declared war on Germany Mr. Steck, although married and above the draft age, enlisted as a private in the Iowa National Guard. He was soon authorized by the Governor to organize a Signal Corps company, which he did, and it was called into active service in June, 1917. Mr. Steck was rewarded for his efforts by being commissioned a captain in the National Army.

His company became Company C, of the 100th Signal Battalion, Thirty-fourth Division. Mr. Steck was in France nearly a year. He was assistant division signal officer and supervised all of the division's signal instruction work. Men who served under him say there were few better officers.

Steck in the Legion.

Mr. Steck was a charter member of the Nelson Post of the American Legion at Ottumwa. From the date of its organization until he entered the Senatorial race he held some office in it by vote of his comrades. In 1919 he was elected National Executive Committeeman from Iowa. He was re-elected in 1920. During both years he was on the National American Legion Legislative Committee. In 1921 he was elected Commander of the Iowa Department, and Hanford MacNider, who was afterward elected National Commander, made him Chairman of the National Legislative Committee.

With these two loads on his shoulders, Mr. Steck won national fame in the veterans' organization. He finished his term as Iowa American Legion Commander with the largest membership in the department's history, and that year Iowa had the largest proportion of legionnaires of any State in the Union.

In his national legislative work Mr. Steck wrote and directed the writing of bills for veterans' relief, which were enacted. His work on hospitalization, rehabilitation, adjusted compensation and other measures is a matter of record in Washington. He gave his service with no remuneration, say his Legion friends, other than the satisfaction he got from knowing he was helping humanity.

"Dan" Steck, they call him in his home town. He is quiet and unassuming. He is neither radical nor reactionary, but he is progressive. He is an able platform speaker. Since the election which he contested Mr. Steck has continued to practice law and to work in and for the American Legion in his post and district and State. He is a familiar figure at all State and national legion conventions.

The race between Brookhart and Steck was a race of legionnaires. Brookhart has served in two wars and has been a member of the Leon Beatty Post, at Washington, Iowa, ever since it was organized. But Brookhart's friendship for La Follette gave him the short end of the service men's vote in the State.

Quality Runs Rings Around Prices

APPEALING prices are, of course, a very important and persuasive feature of Chandler and Cleveland motor cars—but most important and more persuasive are the greater appeals of their rich comfort, their style, their power, their long life, their economical upkeep!

These great Sixes ably show what they are by what they can do. Quality shines out in performance.

The public has seen these two cars go out again and again, and win records in hill-climbing races, in non-stop speed runs, in gruelling endurance contests. To win once might be by accident; to win twice might be good luck; but to win consistently, over and over again, clearly indicates their basic and inherent superiority.

You can see superiority in these cars. Both have strapping big motors, with high-pressure lubrication: Chandler, its famous Pikes Peak Motor; Cleveland, its great Mileage Motor—both virile with power, and of the quiet "L" head design.

Both cars possess the "One Shot" System of centralized chassis lubrication. To oil the entire chassis, all you do is to press a plunger with your heel, "One Shot" does the whole job instantly and thoroughly, relieving you of all work, uncertainty and cause for worry.

If you are intending to invest anywhere from $945 to $1995 in a motor car, reserve your final decision until you have inspected the new Chandler and Cleveland models. They will open your eyes wide to better things.

DISTURBED RUMANIA SEEKS NEW LEADERSHIP

Rise to Power of General Averescu, the Latest Premier, Is Looked Upon Not as a Coup d'Etat But Merely As Innocuous Stop-Gap

By WALTER LITTLEFIELD.

RUMANIA is in a state of feverish transition—political, financial and industrial—but there is nothing to indicate that the result will be sensational. For example it is ridiculous to foresee, on the part of the new Premier, General Alexander Averescu, a coup d'etat, with the return of former Crown Prince Carol at the head of a Fascista Government.

Still, the situation for some time past—the gradual realization that the country was not rehabilitating herself in a manner commensurate with her natural wealth and the usual agitation accompanying the dying days of a legislative mandate—readily allowed a distortion of recent successive events. Quickly upon the heels of Carol's renunciation came the municipal elections, with the tentative resignation of the Bratiano Government, the passage of a Fascista electoral law, and finally the acceptance of the Government's resignation on the day that the four-year mandate of Parliament expired.

Studied Mussolini's Methods.

Then came the forming of a new Government under a man of military reputation, with four other generals as colleagues, and with seven out of the eight Ministers holders of portfolios in the Averescu Cabinet of 1919. The fact has been elaborated on that this is the same General Averescu, who, fresh from a study of Mussolini's methods in Italy, inspired, in June, 1924, a peasant demonstration, when it is declared, the King narrowly escaped losing his throne. As a matter of fact, a demonstration of some sort or other is a favorite outdoor sport in Bucharest—usually to be dispersed by a word from his Majesty, as it was in this case, or by a gesture on the part of the police.

With all the revolutionary potentialities which the Averescu Government is imagined to possess, the fact remains that it is quite an innocuous stop-gap, tiding over until the national elections show what party or combination is to enjoy a two-thirds' sitting in the Chamber. These elections must be held within two months from March 27.

Literally, the worst that can be said about Averescu is that he is the puppet of his predecessor, who counts on a return to power by the victory of his Liberals, for as in Italy the plurality party is assured two-thirds of the seats.

Why, therefore, did the Bratiano Government quit? Why did it not sit tight, direct the national elections under the new law, and so reap an inevitable victory, just as Fascismo did in Italy? The late Premier answers: "A four years' mandate is enough for any Government, any Parliament. An election should be the free expression of the people's will, irrespective of who is in power." Hardly the words of a Mussolini!

Not Really Dictators.

The Bratianos—Ion, the Premier, and Vintila, the Minister of Finance—have often been called "Dictators" of the Kingdom simply because King Ferdinand usually followed their advice. Ion Bratiano is about fifty years of age. He became Premier for the first time in 1907, returned to that office early in 1914, and saw his country through the first years of the war. After allowing an Averescu Government to make peace, he returned to the premiership, which he held until March 27.

The father of these brothers did more than any one else to turn Rumania from a Turkish dependency into an independent kingdom. He placed and replaced the present King's uncle, Charles of Hohenzollern, on the throne. It is natural that in a highly feudalized monarchy, such as Rumania was before the World War, the Sovereign should be guided by the most loyal family. Paradoxical as it may seem, the Bratianos are most cordially hated by the patrician class to which they by birth belong and, until quite recently, were idolized by the peasantry. The principal reason for this is that the brothers were instrumental in modifying the ancient system of land tenure and in elevating a large body of the peasantry from farm laborers to small proprietors.

During the successive Bratiano administrations, even social or political enemies have never questioned their personal honesty and integrity, although Ion has been lampooned for his dandyism by those who would not or could not perceive that he hid a rare acumen under the guise of frivolity. And while the brothers were obviously obsessed by their own economic and financial theories, few have denied their astuteness as politicians.

An Unpopular Embargo.

But when unfavorable trade balances continued; when the farmers could not market their grain outside the kingdom or obtain modern field implements; when there were no new oil wells sunk or mining shafts dug, in a country whose mineral wealth is almost infinite, then the theories of the Bratianos began to be questioned, and there came a definite movement for a change—for a new Government that should remove the embargo on domestic products and invite foreign capital and investors.

There was an unfavorable trade balance for 1925. The Bratianos figured out the 1926 budget, 28,500,000,000 lei at the rate of 50 cents per hundred lei. But when it became known that they were to resign on account of the losses of the Liberal Party at the municipal elections, the rate of exchange dropped to 41 cents per 100 lei, making a deficit of 18 per cent., which is 5,130,000,000 lei, or $21,033,000 of the total budget.

An inflation of currency was quite as obnoxious to the Bratianos as was the granting of concessions for the use of foreign capital. The new Government is preparing for currency stabilization, and it is hoped that the deficit of $21,033,000 may soon be covered by a 50 per cent. cut in the export tax on certain products and the removal of restrictions on others—particularly oil and grain—or rather that the moral effect of such changes may restore the lei.

Leaning Toward Italy.

As regards the foreign policy, the new Government will hasten to pave the way toward more profitable treaties of commerce with other nations, and, in the political field, will make an orientation in the direction of Italy rather than develop that toward France. It is significant that early in the new year Vintila Bratiano sounded London and Paris in regard to an adjustment of the Rumanian foreign debt and to loans contingent upon such an adjustment, but met with no success. At about the same time a concordat, after three years of negotiations, was concluded with the Vatican, and a protocol was arranged with Rome on the basis of which the long-standing financial dispute between Rumania and Italy might be settled. In June, it is believed, General Averescu, if his mandate holds that long, will visit the Fascista Government.

The Bratianos tried to lift the nation by its own bootstraps. When they realized the futility of this, they were ready to allow others to put into effect measures they could not consistently advocate themselves—or measures by which they might profit if returned to power. Whether they do or not depends upon the national elections.

General Averescu's party is the People's Party, and although it has never seriously allied itself with the Opposition, it is understood, since the municipal elections, to have drawn heavily from the Transylvanians of the Opposition. In the old Chamber it had only ten votes. The strongest parties of the Opposition were the Transylvania, or National, Party, led by MM. Vaida and Maniu, and the Peasants, led by Dr. Lupu, having respectively thirty and forty seats. Meanwhile, the National Democratic, led by Professor Jorga, which had only five seats, is understood to have been drawing from the Bratiano Liberals.

Impossible Promises.

The Liberals expect to profit measurably from the concordat in Transylvania, Bukovina and the Banat, which have a preponderant Catholic population; also from the fact that just prior to the resignation of the Bratiano Government the Liberals concluded an agreement with the Magyar Party in Transylvania by promising large concessions in connection with the use of the Hungarian language in the law courts and schools and the retrocession of expropriated properties, as well as the appointment of Hungarians to public posts. But these promises, the Opposition press declares, no Liberal Government could possibly keep and were made only with the object of embarrassing the next Government.

What made the municipal elections of last February more than usually the key to subsequent national ones is the fact that henceforth municipal councils shall each delegate a member for the Senate. But even so, the fact that only about 16 per cent. of those qualified to vote went to the polls is discouraging for all parties. Certainly such indifference does not contain the elements of revolution.

Although the Opposition gained measurably in the municipal elections it did not gain where it was expected to gain. It expected to lose in the cities and gain in the country, where among the agriculturists, it was believed, the policies of the Bratianos had had their worst effect. The contrary was the result.

It is a question whether the country would welcome an untried and inexperienced coalition; but there is no question that should the Liberals return to power, their policy would be a marked improvement over the old. It would no longer be a problem of whether the Government would lift the nation by its own bootstraps.

YOUTH HAD TO TOE THE MARK FOR ELDERS A CENTURY AGO

Children Were Bound Out Until of Age and Parents Did the Dictating

THE girl of today who finds fault with her wardrobe or thinks her pleasures limited and the modern boy who considers he has a grievance because dad won't let him take the car as often as he wishes would do well to compare their circumstances with those of young people a hundred years ago.

Civilization didn't move at the same smart pace then. Work predominated and play occupied a much smaller sphere than it does today.

An analysis of probate court records of a hundred years ago has been made in a Middle Western city once a part of the Western Reserve. These records are representative of the conditions which existed all over the settled portion of the United States when it was a much younger nation.

In contrast with the flapper-type of today, which begins dictating to its parents before the teens are half over, girls—and boys, too—who lived a hundred years ago had little to say about what they would or wouldn't do.

"Binding out" was a common practice. The records show cases in which boys and girls were bound out to serve a master anywhere from five to fifteen years. As the end of servitude usually came when the age of 21 was reached their bondage began early in life.

Here are a few of the examples that were found in the files:

Samuel Stillwell, father of James Stillwell, 10, apprenticed his son to one Abner Murray. James was to learn the "art and mysteries" of a farmer and was to serve Abner for eleven years, or until he was 21 years of age. The senior Stillwell signed his name with a large flourish to a contract which stipulated further that his son was faithfully to serve and obey Murray. In return his employer was to instruct the boy by his best means to read and write and cipher and to teach him arithmetic's "single rule of three."

Elijah Morgan was 6 years old when he was bound out by his mother to serve Luther Lane. Elijah was to remain faithfully with his master until he was 21, keep his master's secrets and obey all his commands. Furthermore, he was not to absent himself without permission and was not to play at any unlawful games nor to harm his master by any means.

Girls as well as boys were bound out to service.

Ann Morgan, 10, was given to Artemus Beebe to serve as his housekeeper until she reached the age of 18. The contract called for obedience to his commands and stated further that she should demean herself toward him in a becoming manner during her term of service.

The PACKARD SIX
Ask the man who owns one

If You Want a Packard Six This Spring—Order It Now

Last year thousands who wanted to buy Packard cars could not get them and had to be satisfied with something less desirable or keep their old cars.

More than twice as many Packard Six cars were sold in 1925 as in 1924. Had Packard been able to provide cars for all who wanted them this record would have been even greater.

This year the 25,000 fortunate owners who secured cars last year, are sending their friends to Packard.

And though well prepared now, it is no doubt but a question of days before our built-up stocks will vanish.

Those who act at once may have an immediate or early delivery of the type of Packard they desire.

Those who wait may be disappointed like the thousands last year.

Quality cannot be built hurriedly, and with Packard, quality comes before quantity.

You may have a Packard Six, a five-passenger Sedan, for example, delivered at your door with all necessary accessories and with freight and tax paid for $2788.78.

If you prefer to buy on the payment plan, you may pay $733.76 on delivery and $194.02 monthly.

May we examine your present car? We will buy it and apply its price on the cost of the new car.

If we may have your car now, or soon, we can sell it in the best market of the year, which of course will be to your advantage.

Then your car buying problems will be over for years to come.

The proof? The majority of last year's buyers told us they intended to keep their new Packards more than twice as long as the cars they traded in.

HUDSON BRIDGE IS GIANT TASK

Great Span Will Be Twice the Size of Next Largest of Suspension Type, Which Is Safe and Enduring

By CHARLES A. JOHNSON.

SUSPENSION bridges, oldest, safest and most picturesque of metal bridges, will attain perhaps their most notable example in the projected Hudson River span connecting Fort Washington and Fort Lee. Little study was required to decide on the type, inasmuch as it is not permissible to place a pier in the river, and the bridge must therefore span from shore to shore. Moreover, the superior economy of the suspension bridge for such great spans and capacities is now generally recognized by engineers.

Even for this type of bridge, however, the exceptional magnitude of this project is almost beyond comprehension. It will have a clear span of 3,500 feet, just twice the length of the Camden-Philadelphia Bridge. The clearance above the water will be 200 feet—ample to permit passage of the largest vessels likely to go up the river at this point.

The cables are to be built either of steel wires or high grade steel eyebars, both types of construction having reached a high degree of perfection in American bridge practice and a degree of safety superior to that of any other type of structural members.

The design is so conceived that it will be feasible to build the bridge at a minimum initial expenditure to serve present traffic needs and to enlarge its capacity as the traffic volume increases. It is expected that the bridge will be open for traffic in 1933 with two twenty-four-foot roadways for four lines of vehicular and bus traffic and two footways for pedestrians. It is estimated that these two roadways will be sufficient to fill the demand for highway traffic for about ten years after the opening of the bridge.

Provision for the Future.

When the traffic increases a forty-foot roadway will be constructed between the twenty-four-foot roadways, providing for a total of eight lines of vehicular traffic. The centre roadway will be used for trucks and the outer roadways reserved for the faster passenger automobiles.

If additional accommodation is needed for trolleys or increased bus traffic four lanes or tracks can be provided on a lower deck under the main floor of the bridge. It is estimated that the bridge can be opened to highway traffic at a cost of less than $50,000,000 and carried to final completion at an additional cost of $20,000,000.

The approach to the bridge will be between 178th and 179th Streets at Broadway and the total overall length of the bridge and approaches will be 8,080 feet. The approaches passing over Riverside Drive will consist of a series of arches about eighty feet high. The anchorage on the New York side will be about 230 feet long; the anchorage on the New Jersey side will be in the solid rock.

The towers carrying the cables are to rise about 630 feet above mean high water and have a base about 220 feet by seventy-five. Comparing them with the Washington Monument, which is fifty-five feet square at the base and 550 feet high, some idea may be gained of the stupendous size of this project. The roadway of the bridge is to be about 235 feet above mean high water and it will pass through the towers beneath an arch ninety-five feet wide and about 230 feet high. These towers will have steel skeletons and will probably be faced with granite.

This bridge is one of the largest engineering projects ever conceived. O. H. Ammann, Bridge Engineer of the Port Authority, has supervised the planning, and Cass Gilbert, architect, has been engaged to see that the bridge has beauty as well as utility and strength.

An American Invention.

The modern type of suspension bridge is the invention of an American. James Finley of Fayette County, Pa., built the first regular suspension bridge in 1796 across Jacob Creek on the turnpike from Uniontown to Greensburg in Pennsylvania. He obtained the first patent on this bridge from the United States Government.

Modern bridge engineers state that Finley's bridges were remarkably well designed structures for that time and he had sound principles of construction. The principal features of his invention consisted in the use of stone abutments, in the introduction only of two chains, one at each side of the bridge, and rigid floor construction. His chains were forged wrought iron links and had a sag of one-seventh of the span.

Up to the year 1801 eight bridges had been built in the United States according to Finley's patent, and between 1801 and 1808 forty more were built. The largest of these was the bridge across the Schuylkill at Philadelphia, with a span of 306 feet.

The most famous of the old chain bridges designed after Finley's patent was the one across the Merrimac River, three miles from Newburyport, Mass., which was built in 1809. It rounded out a century of service, being torn down and rebuilt in 1909 to provide for increased traffic. The old bridge was so much admired for its appearance that the law providing for its rebuilding specified that it should be rebuilt along similar lines.

The original bridge was designed by John Templeman of Washington, D. C., and had a span of 244 feet, clearance of 40 feet above the water and cost $25,000. The two roadways of 15 feet each "were strong enough to allow for the passage of horses and carriages, whatever their speed. The railing was stout and strong, which contributed much to the stiffness of the floor."

The chains for this bridge were forged on the spot and they were not painted for seventy years. When the iron was analyzed it was found to be free from slag, which proves that the purer the metal the better it will resist corrosion.

In 1818 wrought iron eyebars were introduced and in 1828 open-hearth steel eyebars were used. The first wire cable bridge in America was built in 1816 across the Schuylkill in Philadelphia with a span of 408 feet.

The Roebling's Work.

John A. Roebling, the real pioneer of scientifically designed wire cable bridges, first used wire cables in 1844 in the construction of the Pittsburgh aqueduct across the Allegheny River. This bridge consisted of seven individual spans, each 162 feet in length.

In 1854 John A. Roebling accomplished the feat then thought impossible—constructing a combination railroad and highway suspension bridge across the Nigara Falls rapids. This bridge had a span of 821 feet and was the first suspension bridge to be constructed with rational stiffening trusses, assuring a rigid floor. A kite was used to carry the first wire across the river.

The successful completion and use of this bridge inspired confidence and naturally led to other and longer bridges. In 1883 the Roeblings spanned the East River with Brooklyn Bridge, having a span of 1,595 feet, which for simplicity, ruggedness and beauty of line is difficult to surpass. The long span of this bridge was possible because of steel being used for the first time as material for bridge wire.

SOME PROPERTY IS ENJOYED BY OTHERS THAN OWNERS

IN Manhattan a vacant lot that has shade often becomes the neighborhood park. Individuals have favorite spots in it which they deem almost their own. They call it "our park," and prefer it to more formal public ground nearby. When, one day, a steam shovel comes to dig a site for an apartment house the neighborhood feels it has lost something that belonged to it.

Lately the wrecking by fire of the Rockefeller (formerly Billings) Chateau, Fort Tryon Hall, at Fort Tryon was deemed a property loss to hundreds of folk across the valley who do not own any property at all.

"I did so enjoy looking at my chateau," one woman said. "At night with the string of lights leading up to it; in the morning with the sun outlining it in blue and gold; in Winter, when covered with snow; in Summer—all the year around."

Another apartment dweller feels her loss so keenly that she has given notice to her landlord that she intends to move. "I had many pleasant day-dreams with my castle up there," she explained. "I can't bear to live here now that it is gone. I never was there; I never cared to go there; I just enjoyed looking at it on its height across the valley—the spot where Molly Corbin fired her Revolutionary cannon."

SOFT COAL PILES ARE NEARLY GONE

Local Market Has Absorbed 460,000 Tons of the Substitutes on Hand When Hard Coal Strike Ended—Crisis Averted by Cooperation

AFTER the anthracite strike ended on Feb. 12, coal dealers were alarmed over the prospect of having to sell 500,000 tons of substitutes, soft coal and coke, which had accumulated at tidewater. A few days ago the amount of soft coal on hand was only 40,000 tons.

The absorption of 460,000 tons of soft coal and coke in a few weeks was the result of cooperation among the railroads, the coal dealers, the State Fuel Commission, the Atlantic States Shippers' Advisory Committee, the American Railway Association, the New York Retail Coal Merchants' Association and the Brooklyn Coal Exchange. An industrial situation that for a time threatened to work havoc in the coal market and which would, it was feared, impede the entry of freshly mined anthracite, was cleared up by those directly concerned.

The sudden ending of the coal strike sent a wave of depression over the coal markets. The public authorities concerned with seeing that the public was supplied with fuel had been urging the coal dealers to stock up with a month's supply. Prior to that time the supply maintained by the dealers was from hand to mouth. Few dared lay up stocks for four weeks, because none was able to predict the ending of the strike, that meant possible losses due to the inevitable reaction of the market.

Initiative Achieved Much.

Without warning, the coal strike came to an end. Soft coal had accumulated at tidewater. Much more was on the way. Dealers hesitated about taking the coal ordered because the public had the impression that anthracite would soon be available. On Feb. 16, 6,323 cars of substitutes, of fifty tons each, were at tidewater, and this increased to 8,385 cars by Feb. 23. Little more than a month later there were only 871 cars on hand.

Initiative in disposing of the large stock of substitutes was taken by E. J. Cleave, district manager of the American Railway Association, and his assistant, A. G. Warren. Every day Mr. Warren and Mr. Cleave obtained from the railroads figures showing coal on hand and amounts unloaded. These figures gave a graphic picture of the situation and indicated that unless something were done, and that quickly, cars filled with substitutes would not be available for conveying newly mined anthracite to market.

The public's interest in substitutes was almost nil, despite the fact that in the first two weeks anthracite production was meagre and meant little for New York because the available supply had to be spread over a large area. The State Fuel Commission, with the American Railway Association's figures before it, appealed to the public to assist in taking the substitutes off the market by mixing them with their hard coal.

George J. Eltz, Commissioner of the New York Retail Coal Merchants' Association, suggested that the railroads cooperate by using some of the substitutes for their own purposes, mainly for firing locomotives. Although the roads were tied up with contracts that gave them all the coal they needed, they agreed to take 85,000 tons of the substitutes. This made a large hole in the supply, and by public appeals the authorities were enabled to see the stocks recede day after day, until only a nominal amount was left a week ago.

Although anthracite imports into the United States broke all records during the strike, the amount imported was but a fraction of the quantity required by the market. The six months' strike kept approximately 40,000,000 tons of anthracite out of the market. The void had to be filled. West Virginia and other producers of soft coal jumped into the breach, and, as the result of the Interstate Commerce Commission's establishment of through routes and joint rates to the Atlantic States, soft coal was poured into the hard coal consuming States in tremendous volume.

The demand for anthracite was supplied by some dealers who imported Welsh and German anthracite. Total imports during the strike were approximately 600,000 tons, most of it coming from the United Kingdom. Approximately 160,000 tons of coke were imported, most of it from England.

The prominence achieved by the soft coal industry during the strike has served to focus attention upon the future of the industry, because of the increase of production in the non-union fields in recent years. There are indications already that on April 1, 1927, when the Jacksonville agreement regulating prices in the union soft coal fields expires, there will be a strike of miners in the union pits. Congressman Mayer Jacobstein of New York told the House Interstate Commerce Committee recently that legislative measures must be enacted shortly to prepare for the emergency next year. His thought was that continued operation would have to be provided for if the public was to continue to have fuel.

Raising the question of a possible strike next year in the soft coal fields, Mr. Jacobstein said: "The United Mine Workers of America is a powerful organization and will undoubtedly resist a reduction of standards of living for its membership. The union operators, on the other hand, faced with this competition from non-union fields, may insist upon wage readjustments. A deadlock and a strike may ensue. Industry and transportation and public utilities would be temporarily crippled as they have been in the past.

"The terrifically high prices paid for soft coal this Winter while the anthracite strike was in progress, suggests the necessity for Government regulation of the selling agencies. The wide disparity in the price of coal received by the operator at the mine and that paid by the retailer suggests profiteering on the part of the distributor. This profiteering has occurred in five of the seven years since the close of the war."

Other Congressmen, notably Hamilton Fish Jr. of New York, have demanded the creation of a fact-finding bureau, so that the public may be continuously informed about the coal situation. A few days ago President Coolidge added his voice, suggesting that Congress enact coal legislation at the present session. He asked for power in time of need to appoint a board of mediation and to establish a coal administration.

MOTOR CAR USE ON MARTHA'S VINEYARD

STATISTICS compiled by the Martha's Vineyard Chamber of Commerce indicate that the island, although only twenty miles long and five miles wide, has a larger per capita ownership of automobiles than most of the other localities in the United States. The town of West Tisbury, with 332 inhabitants, has one automobile to every 2.7 persons.

The island as a whole has one machine to every 3.77 persons, its resident population being 4,720. Other towns are Chilmark and Tisbury with one automobile to every three persons.

The total number of cars is 1,251, with an assessed valuation of $309,045. There are 639 Fords, 234 Buicks, 75 Dodges and 64 Chevrolets.

MUSSOLINI TO REBUILD ROME

kilometers south on the rim of the city. The new station would be connected with the site of the present station (immediately opposite the old Roman baths of Caracalla) by converting the present right of way into a boulevard. This improvement will free a large area from "incumbrances."

Workers' Homes Started.

Construction of new workingmen's homes, to the south, has already been commenced. In the vicinity of the Porto Maggiore the Government is to create a spacious industrial residential district, where workers can buy homes on the instalment plan. Many new houses have been erected; a number of old structures have been renovated. These, built on a part of Rome left vacant by the ancients, Mussolini intends shall be the nucleus for a model workingmen's residential borough.

Not far away will be the immense public baths, swimming pools, private baths and shower rooms. Like the old Roman institution, the baths of Mussolini are to be social centres. Around them will cluster cinemas, theatres, billiard halls, cafés, tennis courts, athletic fields, and probably a gymnasium. To those who know what the Roman climate is in Summer the outlay for baths will appear justifiable. Rome has suffered for centuries—since the destruction of the ancient baths—for lack of proper bathing facilities.

In recovering and uncovering classical Rome it is purposed first to dig up the old Circus Maximus, which was probably the most colossal arena in the world, laying bare what little remains of its low stone bleachers. Today the Circus is covered partly by turf, partly by macaroni factories. The factories will be moved to the new industrial zone and smaller adjacent buildings will be torn down, leaving a broad open terrain leading up to the Circus and the Palatinate Hill.

Clearing Classic Neighborhoods.

The Ara Pacis, an ancient Roman memorial now buried in one of Rome's slum districts, will be reassembled, in so far as is possible, and re-erected on the Camidoglio, near the site of the old Roman Senate, within view of the Roman Forum. Unsightly lodging houses and shops surrounding the Colosseum and the Roman, Trajan and Ulitorium Forums will be torn down, leaving features of ancient Rome exposed in the midst of an open terrain.

Similar efforts will be applied toward extricating the Pantheon, the best-preserved of all relics of the past, now hemmed in by tumble-down dwellings. A large open square will take the place of the rows of dingy shopfronts and strings of family washing that now greet the tourist as he wanders up to the Pantheon, an approach that hardly accords with one of Rome's most impressive structures, the interior of which is almost as beautiful as it was when built. The Appian Way will be rid of buildings not in accord with its classicism.

The Theatre of Marcellus is an imposing, if mournful, bloc of the past in the midst of Rome's "East Side." Its low arches now house hovels of petty trade. In one a coal merchant sits complacently at the door of his coal bin. In another is a variety shop. A third harbors a tiny grocery store and a fourth an old clothes shop. Inside, part of the gardens formerly connected with the theatre are still preserved. Ex-Ambassador Child formerly lived in a "palace" which formed part of the old structure. Almost around the corner stands the fine little Temple of Vesta (once the Temple of the Sun), in the dungeon of which were confined Vestal Virgins who had broken their vow of chastity, and the Temple Fortuna Virilis, where Rome's young men came to be blessed.

Although Rome is the central piece of Mussolini's reconstruction project, he intends to retouch and restore several other Italian cities. Genoa has gained first attention. The dictator has announced that the town of Christopher Columbus shall be made into a first class port, with adequate equipment to handle the expanded commerce which Italy is to be encouraged to undertake. Genoa's harbor is to be enlarged and re-equipped until it becomes the kind of a harbor Genoa would have liked to have had in the days of Augustus.

Sponsored by the Fascisti, an "architectural redemption" campaign has been started in Florence. The object is to restore to that city the architectural harmony it possessed in the Middle Ages. The few modern house fronts that have been imposed upon the original architectural purity are to be rebuilt in the manner of its master builder. Work has already been begun on two offending structures near the River Arno.

UNCLE SAM AS WOMAN'S BOSS

Before Civil War Women Were Not Recognized In Their Own Right as Government Employes —General Spinner Their First Friend

A WOMAN was recently elected Mayor of Seattle. Another announced her intention of accepting the candidacy to succeed her husband as Governor. The Mandate Committee of the League of Nations included a woman delegate. In Washington, D. C., a woman is in general charge of applying the law to bootleggers.

Yet only little more than fifty years ago a woman, to procure employment from the Government, had to conceal her sex. She had to apply for her work, the copying of land warrants for the General Land Office, in the name of a male relative. It was done at home and she received $1,200 a year, the salary received by men for that service.

In 1862 a woman was allowed a clerk's desk in the Treasury Department—to substitute for a man. She was accorded the privilege of replacing her husband, who had fallen ill, in order that the family might be supported. She did her husband's work and received his salary—not because she was as competent as he, but because she was registered as a man.

To the Treasury Department also belongs the distinction of first employing women in their own right. General Francis Elias Spinner, appointed United States Treasurer by President Lincoln, conceived the idea as a means of saving the Government money in those expensive war times.

"A woman can use scissors better than a man," he told Salmon P. Chase, Secretary of the Treasury, "and she will do it cheaper. I want to employ women to cut the Treasury notes."

Women Flocked In.

Following the consent of the Treasury chief, scores of needy women, whom the war had left bereft of supporters, flocked to General Spinner's little room in the nation's bank. Here he slept, to be within call in case of trouble. Here every woman was sure of a hearing.

She did not receive an official appointment nor had she any official existence. She was merely handed a pair of scissors and paid $600 a year out of the fund provided by Congress for temporary clerks. Cutting Treasury notes into quarters was considered "light work," but, as each note trimmer discovered, a few hours of it wearied the shoulders and blistered the fingers.

Appreciating this opportunity to support themselves, however, more and more women beset the General for jobs. Believing that the nimbleness of their fingers and their patience would be assets in the manipulation of fractional currency, he opened this field to them and also the detection of counterfeits.

The results pleased him. Speaking of women as counterfeit detectors, he said: "A man will examine a note systematically and deduce logically from the imperfect engraving, blurred vignette or indistinct signature that it is counterfeit—and be wrong four cases out of ten. A woman picks up a note, looks at it in a desultory fashion of her own and says, 'That's counterfeit.' 'Why?' 'Because it is,' she answers promptly—and is right eleven cases out of twelve."

Many Criticisms Heard.

Notwithstanding the satisfaction of the employer, criticisms were received from indignant persons all over the country, individuals shocked by the radical action of the Treasurer. Even at home he encountered opposition. Hugh McCulloch, successor to Secretary Chase, scorned the presence of a tea pot on each window ledge. "There are too many tea pots in the Treasury of the nation," he complained—after which remark the innocent kettle became the universal emblem of woman's unfitness for Government service.

"Nobody ever heard that the costly cigars and tobacco which filled the man clerks 'nooning,' to the exhilaration of body and soul, was a like sign of his inability to perform prolonged service without the aid of stimulants," said Mary Clemmer Ames in her book, "Ten Years in Washington," "but the tea pots were ridiculed out and ceased to distill the gentle beverage for the woman worker at her noonday lunch."

Congressmen, necessarily concerned with increasing their constituency, vented their eloquence in the deprecation of women workers, so that the males might be favored. Arguing that a woman was not a clerk but an employe, they decreed she could never, regardless of her services, earn more than $900 a year. On the other hand, no man, were he only a messenger executing the instructions of a woman, could receive less than $1,200.

Defenseless, women dared not complain. As one worthy official told them, they "were only here by sufferance and could all be turned out tomorrow."

A few appealed to the Secretary of the Treasury, but his retort that "$400 is enough for any woman to receive for her work" soon silenced them. In the Department of the Interior the Secretary constantly demoted women workers to make place for the men.

Even the women's friend in Congress, Representative H. L. Dawes of Massachusetts, opposed all projects to raise their pay because, by making their humble positions desirable to men, they would be compelled to leave the Government service altogether.

Ball Continued to Roll.

Despite antagonism, their first friend, General Spinner, remained their ally.

"The experiment of employing females as clerks," he wrote in his report of 1868, "has been, so far as this office is concerned, a complete success. The truth is that many of the female clerks now do as much work, if not more, and do it as well, if not better, for $900 per annum, than some of the male clerks are able to do who receive a yearly salary of twice that amount.

"The female clerks, with but few exceptions, are subject to greater risks of loss by reason of miscounts or by passing counterfeits, for which each one is pecuniarily liable and responsible, than nine-tenths of the male clerks, whose principal occupations are books and accounts. Right and fair dealing, therefore, demand that their pay should be assimilated more nearly than it now is to that of the other sex for like services and responsibilities."

A generation later, when the woman's movement was progressing, General Spinner wrote: "The fact that I was instrumental in introducing women to employment in the offices of the Government gives me more real satisfaction than all the other deeds of my life."

General Spinner had started a fertile movement indeed. Today there are 7,993 women in the storehouse of the nation's billions, 500 more than the male number. From the harsh employer of a handful of unrecognized women, Uncle Sam has developed, in little more than half a century, into the bountiful boss of 79,575 women, and the chief of a woman's public service that includes two Governors, three Congresswomen, an Assistant Attorney General, a State Supreme Court Judge, many minor Judges, three State Secretaries, about 150 State legislators, two diplomats and two State Superintendents of Public Instruction.

RECORDS OF SISTINE SINGERS TO BE MADE

THE famous choristers of the Sistine Chapel soon will sing for the phonograph records to be made by a French company. They are to be directed by Mgr. Raffaele C. Casimiri, who is in charge of the choir of St. John Lateran and acts as professor of church music at the Pontifical School in Rome. The Sistine Choir, formed originally under Gregory the Great, was attached to that particular chapel by Pope Sixtus IV in 1473. Pope Paul III gave it its present organization.

FLY FISHING ART TRACED TO WOMAN

Dame Juliana Berners Started the Endless Wrangle Over Trout Lures—World Ransacked Now for Bait to Attract Wily Fishes

SPORTSMEN who go "fysshynge wyth an angle" to whip placid lake, purling stream and babbling brook at this opening of the trout season are so many disciples of a faire ladye, the Dame Juliana Berners, into whose "treatyse" on the art of taking fish with a fly, garrulous old Izaak Walton himself dipped freely—to the ratification of centuries of devotees of rod and line.

The Dame Juliana, a veritable Diana of the streams, knew not only how to handle an angle but is blamed by some for starting—unwittingly—endless contentions over the proper fly for the proper place, the proper time, the proper sky and water. For your angler, quiet, patient on the stream, has his own ideas about trout lures which he is nothing loath to express at such times as he is not actively engaged in his favorite pastime.

To the lay mind a collection of dozens of trout and salmon flies is but a confusing array of colors. They range from dull drab to brilliant scarlet, many of them tagged with names not even remotely suggesting a particular insect, bug, larvae or other form of fish food. Whence came this constantly growing family of flies, some not even passible imitations of anything in nature? But softly, this is debatable ground and there are, mayhap, fly fishermen as temperamental as a prima donna in her own opera house.

An extensive bibliography of fish lures is in itself a lure to the layman whose reading, if it does not convert him to the delights of fly fishing, may at least make of him a fisherman in imagination who whips streams from the easy chair by the steam radiator in Winter, or from a wicker rocking chair on the porch of a Summer cottage.

Dame Juliana mentions twelve kinds of flies or lures for trout. Major John Waller Hills, an English angling critic, says that eleven of these have been identified and are the basis of, if they are not identical with, certain flies in use today. In the dame's time fly dressers had no reels on their rods. To kill a four-pound trout on a one-hair line or a fifteen-pound salmon on a three-hair line was no inconsiderable feat. Dame Juliana's first dun fly is to be seen today as the February red. It is dressed with a partridge feather for wings and a brown body. Her second dun, the olive dun, is the stone fly. The red spinner is her fly made of "roddyd" (ruddy) wool and her yellow may is the little yellow may of today.

Flies of Other Colors.

The dun cut is the yellow dun. Her mauve (mulberry color) and tandy (tan) are regarded as two dressings of the may fly in different States. The wasp fly is self-explanatory. The drake fly, black body and dark mallard wing, is like the modern alder. Lastly the shell fly is the shell fly of Ronalds described three centuries later. The other fly, the black louper, appearing in May, Major Hills says, seems to be a hackle fly, corresponding to the black palmer, or coch-y-bonddhu, but cannot be identified exactly. The dame advises an angler to cut open a fish "and see what is therein" as the best way of finding out just what kind of insect the fish are feeding on. This advice is good even in the twentieth century.

But trout or any other kind of fishing is not so serious nor so complicated a game as some would make it out to be. The writer only a few years ago met a boy leaving Green River in the Berkshires, where William Cullen Bryant liked to fish, with a string of beautiful trout taken with a plain, limber pole and hook baited with what the lad called "grube." But it was early in the season and he had had "first crack" at the river. Also he knew how to fish.

Almost every fisherman has his pet theories about flies. Major Hills divides flies into three classes, each with its contentious advocates. First come those who contend that the fly should be an imitation of fly life generally; a fair model of an insect but not a copy of any one species, genus or group. These he calls the fancy flies.

Next are the general flies; those which imitate a group of insects but not an individual of the group. Advocates of these regard imitation as of greater importance than the state of weather, sky or water, but regard precise imitation of a specific kind of insect as impossible and unnecessary. The third class of flies is that in which an attempt is made at imitating the individual species of insect on which trout are supposed to be feeding at the time.

But there are scores and scores of trout and salmon flies. Even these classifications by Major Hills, general as some may be, do not cover the ground. The groups overlap. Furthermore, say experts, even the advocates of the specific or individual school are divided against themselves. Some believe in the closest possible imitation of the color of insects, whereas others insist that in attempts to fool the trout color is not so important as perfection in form.

Thomas B. Mills, who shares with Edward R. Hewitt, son of the late Mayor Abram S. Hewitt, a leading place among American anglers, once remarked:

"If fish knew as much as some anglers think they do, very few would ever be caught."

Many if not the greater part of the flies in use today should be described not as "flies," in the sense that they are imitations of insects, but as lures. Since the day of Alfred Ronalds (London, 1836) little attempt has been made to identify the fly of the trout angler with the insect of nature. He explains that "dun," as used by the angler, is applied in a general sense to different species of ephemeridae in their first winged state, excepting those of largest size, a qualifying word being used to designate each species, as Blue Dun, Yellow Dun, &c.

Spinner is used as a general name for the final change or perfect state of the same insects.

I Know What I Want

Come to think of it, I never have gone into an automobile salesroom, picked out the car I really wanted and bought it. . . . Always I have let the matter slide until some salesman I never saw or heard of before . . . and of whose judgment in motor cars or anything else I knew nothing . . . came in and sold me. . . . Generally he succeeded in selling me a car I had not been considering, either . . . and which I didn't like after I got it.

Now I know what I want . . . this time I am going to reverse the order, decide for myself . . . and give some automobile salesman the surprise of his young life.

Going in tomorrow and buy the car I want.

I have decided I want to own a Rickenbacker.

Six . . . or Vertical Eight?

Not sure on that point . . . some friends who own them tell me you get all you can possibly want in a Rickenbacker Six . . . Others insist there is a super-something in the performance of that Vertical Eight that sets the blood a'tingle every time you touch the accelerator.

All agree, tho, that the utmost in up-to-dateness in body design . . . quality of upholstering . . . finish . . . and other details that are dear to my heart and hers . . . are to be found only in a Rickenbacker . . . unless you pay two or three thousand dollars more . . . and they will have to show me the difference before I will pay that.

As for the chassis . . . I guess there is no contention on that score . . . For five years at least the Rickenbacker chassis has been held up as the most outstanding example of fine engineering . . . and beautiful construction . . . on either continent.

Every salesman I have ever talked to either openly admitted . . . or unconsciously conceded . . . that superiority to Rickenbacker . . . while trying to convince me his car was just as good.

I follow these things fairly closely . . . a car is a mighty important thing in one's everyday life. I have observed that Rickenbacker was first to introduce (and prove) the advantages of all the really great engineering discoveries since the war.

First to use two fly wheels . . . first with 4-wheel brakes . . . mechanical brakes, too . . . My experience of the last year tells me mechanical brakes must be the only kind . . . certainly must be safer . . . solid metal can't leak anyway!

Rickenbacker was proclaiming "Air Cleaners" three years ago . . . sounded foolish to me at the time . . . why clean air?

But this year I notice they are all hollering about their air cleaners . . . those very makers and dealers who then told me it was a useless appendage . . . now say it is vital to the life of the motor!

Interesting, when you think of it . . . how this post-war concern could have shown the way to all the old fellows . . . in so many important improvements and inventions . . . Easy, tho, when you consider Rickenbacker engineers had nothing to discard . . . could design a post-war car from the ground up.

Here I sit selling myself this car . . . mentally I bought one long since.

I buy a Rickenbacker . . . mentally . . . every time one of the lithe things slides past me on the road . . . or jumps ahead of me in a traffic jam . . . or stops when I can't stop . . . never a sound from those brakes either . . . that shows they don't grab . . . no question in my mind about those brakes being better . . . friends who drive them say there just are no other brakes in the world.

I know what I want . . . I crave the pleasure that comes from the ownership of a super-anything.

Yes, I admit, I like to see friends glance admiringly . . . and rivals look enviously . . . at my car as I glide by.

I know what I want—I want a Rickenbacker . . . and before another salesman gets hold of me . . . and diverts me from my desire . . . I am going to phone the Rickenbacker dealer to have a car ready for me to drive—right now. Let's see . . . dealer's name is . . .

DEAN POUND TELLS WHY CRIMINAL JUSTICE FAILS

American Legal System That Served in Pioneer Days Must Be Made Over to Suit New Conditions, Says Head of Harvard Law School—Faults to Be Corrected

DEAN ROSCOE POUND of the Harvard University Law School has his own pointed opinions regarding the "lawlessness" of our day.

"The American people are in a new setting," he says. "The pioneer spirit, which was a virtue a hundred years ago, is not exactly suited to 1926. A good deal of what we are told is lawlessness is nothing but this spirit of pioneer America trying to adjust itself to urban America.

"The frontier is gone, but we still have a pioneer attitude toward law. Imagine telling our grandfathers that they might not walk across the street where they pleased. You can't expect new regulations of any sort to sink in over night. Yet consider the variety of such regulations and their increase in number."

Born in Nebraska fifty-six years ago, the Dean still has something of the prairies about him. He is of medium height and virile build; his hair and mustache are scarcely touched yet with silver. He is rather the congenial American business-man type than the retiring scholar. As an authority on the subject of criminal justice he is associated with many commissions and research bodies in the field of law.

He had just returned to his Langdell Hall office at Cambridge one recent day, after a long session with a class in Roman law. He was tired, yet for an hour or more he discussed for the interviewer the breakdown of criminal justice.

The "Crime Wave"

In a late magazine article President Emeritus Hadley of Yale University said: "Nullification is not revolution. It is the safety valve which helps a self-governing community to avoid the alternative between tyranny and revolution." Professor Pound, when asked to express an opinion on this justification of a debatable practice, associated the "right to nullify" with the frontier attitude toward law, of which he had spoken. "The nullification spirit," he said, "would require a great deal of adjustment to make it suitable today."

The Dean spoke of the crime waves of other eras and wondered if the public might not be overestimating the temporary increase in lawbreaking. He suspected that, making allowance for the growth of cities, the characteristic rise of violence in any post-war period and the increase in number of statutes defining acts as crime, there would be but little crime surplus left to account for.

Urging caution at every step, the Dean warned that care should be taken, in our measures to protect society under the stress of the present tendency toward lawlessness, not to go to an extreme in the treatment of the accused.

"Criminal law all through history," he pointed out, "has swung back and forth between a minute regulation of the court and the magistrate in their dealings with offenders and a very minute discretion; or between over-tenderness for the individual accused at the expense of the general security, and, on the other hand, an over-regard for the general security and a callous disregard of the rights of the individual accused.

"What I hope for is that presently we shall learn enough to reach a scientific balance between the two extremes. The last high-water mark in the solicitude for the accused was reached toward the end of the nineteenth century. There is a tendency in the other direction now, and I think there is danger that we shall move too fast and too far."

Present-Day Problems.

Dean Pound applied the general principle just outlined to the current discussion of the subject of bail.

"It is all very well to make bail difficult for the professional criminal," he said, "but we don't want to make it impossible for the innocent man to get the bail he is constitutionally entitled to. The difficulty is largely a matter of poor administration. If we should change the law a hundred times we should do no good."

The Dean thought it too early to come to a decision as to the effect of prohibition; that if we are to try to enforce prohibition, we must realize that it will detract our energies from enforcing other laws. He called attention to the fact that the Federal courts had excelled the State courts in efficiency until recently, but that now they are as crowded as the State courts.

After discussing the need of adjusting the spirit of rural America to the conditions of crowded cities, and pointing out that little can be accomplished in the way of remedy through legislation, Professor Pound considered other factors involved in bad criminal justice. He mentioned first the "enormous increase in agencies that menace the general security."

"Take the motor vehicle, alone," he suggested. "And I suppose aviation will bring in more problems. The old-time drug store was not a menace, but see how the narcotic traffic must be regulated today.

"The more crowded we are, the more complex our social organization and our economic order, the more law we must have, whether we want it or not. In the pioneer community the points of contact are few. As a result, it doesn't take many legal precepts to maintain the general security. But in the enormous cities the contacts are almost infinite, and we must do something to harmonize the relations of one man with another. Consequently we must have more law. And the more law, the more difficult it is to enforce."

Dean Pound pointed to the legal history of Rhode Island as illustrating the trend. In early days the Public law of Rhode Island recognized fifty crimes. In 1872 the General Statutes of the State recognized 128 crimes. In 1923 they recognized 212 crimes, more than four times as many as 100 years ago.

Even that is not the whole story, the professor pointed out, for whole new categories of crime had grown up in the 100 years. For instance, there are those associated with factory administration. As a result, the number of offenses that can be prosecuted as crimes in Rhode Island have doubled in fifty years and have multiplied by eight in 100 years.

"The burden that has been thrown on the prosecuting machinery as a result of this change is enormous," Dean Pound continued. "We must learn to take some of that load off prosecution and put it on administration. The whole spirit of our polity is to give effect to police regulations through prosecution. That is all right in a rural society, but it is not suited to an urban, industrial society.

"The rest of the world, the Continent of Europe especially and England largely, enforces police regulations by administrative machinery. Consequently their courts and their prosecuting machinery do not have any such load as ours.

Punitive, Not Preventive.

"We have set up many boards and commissions, but we still have much to learn to conduct administration in such a way that we shall have a government of law, and not of men."

The Dean turned to the place of preventive justice as a factor in the situation, pointing out that we have just begun to scratch the surface of that fruitful field. Our system is punitive rather than preventive, he said, and what there is in the way of preventive justice is achieved not by legal but b. extra-legal agencies, notably by social workers. The Dean urged better team play between judicial administration of justice and these extra-legal social agencies, insisting that preventive justice is as important as preventive medicine.

Finally Dr. Pound called for a complete adaptation of a criminal justice devised for nineteenth-century America to the present urban industrial America, considering briefly in turn police administration, the prosecution machinery, the courts, and penal treatment.

He pointed out that Raymond Fosdick has shown how thoroughly our organization of police is affected by the conditions of 100 years ago. The primary difficulties, he says, result from what Mr. Fosdick calls "amateur administration," and from the attempt to meet the needs of an urban community by merely adding numbers to the administrative force or by adding more uncoordinated administrative agencies to a system devised originally for small towns.

"I suspect," the Dean continued, that in the organization of the prosecutor's office will be found a great deal of the weakness of our criminal system. It is not a question of when the best men and the worst men are continually caught in a bad machine. Of course there are exceptions to the rule. But compare the organization of a prosecuting attorney's office with the legal office of a great public utility.

"The assistants in a prosecuting attorney's office are important persons, yet often they go in and out with every administration, and not much attention is paid to who they are. We pay very little attention to the organizing of that office.

"Then we must organize judicial administration. That is done fairly well in the Federal judicial system, but in the State courts we are far behind the times. It is just as nearly impossible to handle the enormous calendars of our big cities today with the administrative methods of the past as it would be to handle the business of a modern manufacturing plant with the business methods of 100 years ago. England is somewhat ahead of us here, but we cannot borrow their system. We must study their system and our problem, and see how far we can use their experience."

"We have done big things in the improvement of penal treatment. America is recognized as a pioneer in that field. What we suffer from most is inadequate administration."

A study of contemporary American police organization, prosecuting machinery, courts, bar and penal treatment, the Dean continued, reveals seven striking faults common to the whole criminal system.

"First," he said, "the transition from rural to urban and from urban to metropolitan conditions has not been met by intelligent reconstruction but by patching and tinkering.

"Second, there is a lack of continuity in administration. Usually, about the time an administrative official learns to do his work well, he is replaced by another who has to learn it over. This is one of the legacies of pioneer America.

"Third, especially in the courts, but everywhere in the administration of justice, there is a rigidity of organization that makes impossible an adjustment to rapid growth and diversity of population. This impedes the effectiveness of all the agencies of criminal justice.

"Fourth, there is a tendency throughout the system to perfunctory routine, partly because we have yet to learn how to administer and partly because there is no effective coordination and supervision of administration. Officials become caught, as it were, in the cogs of machinery and cease to bestir themselves.

Administration of Courts.

"Fifth, we carry division of power so far, and responsibility is so diffused and ill-defined, that it is difficult to hold any one to account for unsatisfactory results. It has happened more than once that a great lawyer, an excellent judge, has proved not to be an effective administrative head of the courts.

"One of the great achievements in England in the reorganization of the courts was the concentration of responsibility for the effective use of judicial power in the Chancellor. Under the present organization in England, if the judicial machine does not function as it should, the Chancellor can be held responsible.

"In most American jurisdictions we carry diffusion of responsibility so far that even the clerk of the court is independently responsible to the people. The practical result is that responsibility cannot be located.

"Sixth, the pioneer trait of assuming that any man is equal to any job is carried so far as to assume versatility even on the part of subordinates. Officials and subordinates alike are expected to do specialized work offhand in a system of frequent rotation. There is no adequate provision for the specialization required in the administering of justice in a great city.

"Seventh, there is no provision for intelligent study of the administrative machinery either by those who operate it or by any one else."

Dean Pound proposes, as the most important immediate step in the way of remedy, the "proper provision for thoroughgoing study of the matter of criminal justice." More specifically, he advocates the immediate establishing of law-school professorships in criminal law. Recently in the Harvard Alumni Bulletin he outlined the need and the remedy.

Modernizing Justice.

"Despite all that the criminologists have done in the last generation," he wrote, "the criminal law is still framed chiefly in terms of punishing the vicious will. Despite all that criminologists and physicians have shown as to the necessity of special institutions with expert management for many classes of delinquents, the legal theory of ideal equality before the law leads the criminal law, whenever it is in the hands of lawyers, to consign all to a common prison.

"Despite all that psychiatry and psychology have achieved, the lawyer can draw only a plain straight line between an artificial legal conception of insanity and a no less artificial legal conception of mental responsibility.

"Where anything has been accomplished in the way of individualization of penal treatment, in almost every case it has had to be done through administrative boards and commissions, acting on principles radically different from those of the criminal courts and with courts and bar largely out of sympathy with them.

"While it may not be pretended that the subject is one exclusively for lawyers or for legal scholars, it must be insisted that the contributions from the other social sciences will be effectively utilized only when and as they are worked into the law by lawyers.

"The best mode of conducting legal research of the sort is through a professorship in a modern law school in which the main portion of the professor's time and energy is given to research, but in which he is under the necessity of formulating, expounding and maintaining his ideas before classes of well-trained students.

"Chiefly it should be seen to that the professor is in a position to write a treatise which will capture the profession and the courts and through them the law. A modern book by a master, making use of the resources of other sciences, would remake our criminal law in less than a decade."

In concluding the present interview Dean Pound summarized the problem before the country.

"We must realize," he said, "that there is more than one difficulty involved, that some of the difficulties are deep-seated, and that we cannot expect to settle them offhand. It took England from 1828 to 1873, and the English had a much simpler problem."

BELLEVUE HOSPITAL'S STORY

Through Long Service the Institution Has Kept Pace With the City

By ANNE TJOMSLAND, M. D.

ON a little strip of Manhattan Island, facing the gray and turbulent waters of the East River, stands Bellevue Hospital. Back of it lies the city it has served for more than a hundred years. Bellevue has reflected in turn the light of the gospel shining upon the land, the limelight of politics and the dawn of scientific medicine. Like its present buildings, it is a mixture of the new and the old, a symbol of progress and prejudice, of every-day toil and romance, of routine and innovation.

It is not to be commended to those who look upon life from a pedestal. It lives on the pavement and vibrates with the doings and undoings of a gigantic city. It gathers the dead and dying from river and streets and is kept busy day and night with the misery of the living. Bellevue makes no discriminations. It takes the fortnighter by the scruff of the neck and with a sly wink ties him into bed; lends a forgetting ear to the stories of criminals and drug addicts; listens to the tales of weary mothers and wives—in many languages; nurses broken-down strangers from all lands; receives those conquered in life's battles with much understanding and does not hesitate to find employment for them when they have recovered.

It has traditions, customs, even a language of its own—a language that might be called irreverent by the outside world, but is not. When the watchman at night slams the gate on the morgue wagon and says to himself: "Another stiff gone," it is but the inevitable reflection of hospital life which has only two conclusions. A certain kindly, easy-going atmosphere prevails, based on a tacit understanding among those who labor therein that the structure will hold together and expand with the city to which it has pledged its existence.

Original Entrance to Bellevue Hospital.

The Humble Beginning.

Bellevue Hospital—which now has a capacity of over 1,800 beds and building projects for the housing of 2,400 patients, where more than 262 miles of dressing gauze is used every year, where an average of 1,000 patients are treated daily in its clinics—had its humble origin in a room 25 by 23 feet, containing six beds. This was the Hospital Department of the first New York City Almshouse, opened in 1796. A second almshouse with its small hospital, built in 1796, soon proved too small for the rapidly growing city, and in 1811 the cornerstone of a new penitentiary was laid, "for wise purposes, combining a greater number of objects." Its main building is still standing and is the Administration Building of the present Bellevue Hospital.

It was not the first time, however, that the Bellevue lands had been used in the services of the city. Toward the end of the eighteenth century yellow fever epidemics were spreading death and terror among the inhabitants, many of whom fled to surrounding villages. The city seemed deserted. At night nothing was heard in the streets save the watchman on his lonely rounds. No one was seen in the smoky glare of burning tar that was everywhere placed in the streets to check the spread of the pestilence. The city authorities then purchased a plot of land opposite the "three mile stone" (three miles out of the city), and here erected a pest house for the care of the victims. This plot of land was then called Belle Vue Place and is a portion of the present Bellevue grounds. At that time it belonged to the old Kip estate, known for 150 years as the Kip's Bay Farm, stretching along the East River shore, four miles from the city.

In the early days the hospital was only a necessary adjunct to the penitentiary, but as time went on the care of the sick became the dominant phase of the work. In 1817 there were more than 200 patients in the hospital, cared for by one visiting physician and one interne, who "labored diligently by day and by night."

Times of Greatest Stress

The history of Bellevue Hospital is closely interwoven with the outward calamities that may befall any large city—fires, pestilence, wars and financial depressions. It has borne the brunt of epidemics of yellow fever, typhus, Asiatic cholera and influenza. It has sent its men to the front twice—during the Civil War, when it had to fight a deadly epidemic of typhus within its own walls, losing a large number of its doctors and nurses—and again during the World War, when the remaining staff was also pressed to the utmost in fighting another insidious enemy, the "flu." At both times there was neither time nor adequate equipment for burial, so fast fell the victims.

Following the Civil War the first system of hospital ambulances in this country—and indeed in the world—was established at Bellevue. It was in June, 1869, that the first two ambulances of Bellevue Hospital were ready for service. At present there are ten ambulances and fourteen drivers, who "let her go" on the traffic behind a steering wheel with the same undiluted joy that possessed their brethren of old behind high-stepping, spirited horses.

Conditions at the hospital were at one time such that instead of being an inn for gathering strength and refreshment on the highway of life, it had become a short cut to the journey's end. This much calumniated period in the history of Bellevue Hospital still lives in the stories of the "Bellevue Black Bottle," which mothers tell in the vast nursery of the lower east side. "I'll send ye to Bellevue," or "I'll tell the Gerry Society on ye," are two powerful weapons in hands that rock cradles and wield broomsticks.

Yet it is from this very time that we see the beginning of the conviction that a hospital is a necessity in the teaching of surgery and medicine. The cry to better conditions had become persistent. The city authorities of these remote times then decided that there was no remedy like the light of day and appointed a committee of prominent medical men to effect a reorganization. This the committee did, and more, by laying the foundation of the educational and scientific work of the institution as it is known to thousands all over the world today.

The Four Divisions.

Reorganized and partly rebuilt, Bellevue at present contains four large divisions with three well-known universities—Columbia, Cornell and New York—attached to the first three divisions respectively. The fourth division remains largely non-collegiate, the so-called "open division." The two original main divisions of medicine and surgery have been subdivided, so that each specialty known to modern medicine has a department to itself in the vast complex of buildings.

But the hospital is still overcrowded. The war made a halt in the progress of building. The insane, the tuberculous, the thousands of clinic patients who yearly come and go, are all waiting for the city or public-spirited citizens to fulfill the text inscribed on the wall of the Bellevue Clinic: "Freely ye have received, freely give."

Facts should stand in relation to time and place. They did when the cornerstone of the hospital was laid by De Witt Clinton, a man whose vision included both the Erie Canal—nicknamed "Clinton's Ditch"—and the place of refuge called Bellevue Hospital.

And now our present energetic Mayor, James J. Walker, knows the facts, and not through the mist of printed reports. For he visited the hospital recently, saw the improvised beds and cots in corridors and felt the depression of dark, low-ceilinged wards, an added punishment to the prisoners and those walking in the muddled night of insanity.

This direct vision of things as they are has appealed to a sympathetic imagination, and ultimate progress is bound to follow.

A large share of the success and high standing accorded to Bellevue in late years is due to the establishment of the New York Training School for Nurses at Bellevue Hospital. Before the nineteenth century, outside of religious orders, nursing was, in general, regarded as a menial occupation that did not attract women of character; an occupation ill-paid and ill-respected. The training school—the first of its kind in America—was opened at Bellevue in 1873, with Miss Helen Bowden of London as the first superintendent. An outgrowth of the school is the Bureau of Social Service and Convalescent Relief of Bellevue Hospital, organized in 1908 by one of the graduates and largely manned by nurses.

At the present time, an average of sixty nurses is graduated each year and about five hundred nurses are on constant duty. It is a hard-working crew, asking not, "How long will it take us?" but, "What else is there to be done?" There is always much more. Their task is overwhelming. At times their efforts have been almost superhuman, and many have laid down their lives in doing "the work that calls."

There are no more quaking coaches, smoky links and dancing fire lits at Bellevue. The three-decker beds have been thrown into the junk pile, together with the hempen ropes that tied the "hasty rogues" to them. The alcoholic ward is but a memory. One no more hears the "honey-cart" rattle over rough cobble stones at midnight, conveying the dead from ward to dead-house slip. Many of the old things have passed away under the pressure of changing times and necessity, but enough of the artistic old buildings remain to fling over the place a spell of romance and charm.

Looking in through the Twenty-sixth Street gate, one sees the curved stairway and old portico with its curiously wrought iron railing, beneath which a tablet states that this formed part of the balcony of Federal Hall, where Washington delivered his first inaugural address. Three-storied galleries run along the old hospital wards and never have Barnum & Bailey and the numerous musicians who have performed on the green below been closer to any audience than that peering out through the lovely grill work of these old galleries.

The green vines love the old walls and cover them tenderly. It is here that poets like to dream and painters to put up their easels, while the Fire Department consigns it all to the scrap-heap. Very soon stone will not be left upon stone of the old penitentiary, the chapels and the archways, but the heart and soul of the place will remain. For, behind the present-day correct and stately buildings, laboratories and clinics float the dreams of those who lived and fought and died for it.

Y. W. C. A. CONVENTION SEEKS LIGHT ON MANY PROBLEMS

Gathering at Milwaukee Will Take Up Large Issues—100 New York Delegates

MORE than one hundred New York delegates will attend the ninth biennial convention of the Young Women's Christian Associations to be held in Milwaukee April 21-27. The party will include delegates from most of the eighteen metropolitan branches.

Members from the 1,102 affiliated associations meet in convention every two years to discuss all phases of the life of woman today. Among the problems that will probably be taken up at the 1926 convention will be the role of women in international politics and her position as a factor in the promotion of international good-will.

The part to be played by women in domestic legislation, especially in such questions as that of protective legislation for women, will also come in for attention from the delegates. The Y. W. C. A. has been opposed to the so-called equal rights amendment proposed for the Federal Constitution. Other legislative problems which will probably be taken up are the child labor amendment and the proposed Federal department of education. Marriage and divorce laws are also on the list, as well as the Maternity and Infancy act, whose Federal appropriations expire in 1927.

Interested in Quota Law.

Other subjects that are proving of special interest in the expanding activities of the orgahization are the social consequences caused by such governmental regulations as the immigration quota laws, entailing as they do the enforced separation of families.

The convention will have representatives of three distinct groups in attendance—industrial, business and professional and college delegates.

The industrial delegates will appear on behalf of the 20,000 or more "Y. W." girls who work in factories or shops. Their problems are naturally very different from those of the college women, whose chosen delegates will bring to their aid, however, the training and ideals and ambitions of 108,000 members in the undergraduate bodies of American colleges and universities.

Midway between these two groups stand the business and professional women, whose membership in the "Y. W." totals 125 000. They bring to the reality of the factory and shop worker and the idealism of the college girl a further knowledge and experience—a comprehension of the business world and its demands.

Scope of the Association.

Of all organizations of women, the "Y. W." is probably the most real to the self-supporting woman. She uses it. The "Y. W." serves her at almost every turn of life, in some tangible way, whether she is enrolled as a member or not. There exists all over the United States, and in forty other countries besides, a great chain not only of associations, each of them made up of clubs of women and girls, but also a chain of well-equipped plants, as it were—the physical apparatus for service, from gymnasiums, swimming pools and tennis courts to residence halls, cafeterias and employment bureaus; from Summer camps to lecture halls, clubrooms and libraries.

One says the Y. W. C. A., or perhaps the "Y. W." for short, and uses it interchangeably for local or national body. But that is not strictly correct. The national organization is the Young Women's Christian Associations of the United States, and it came into being as such in 1906 with Miss Grace Dodge as its first President. That office is now held by Mrs. Frederic M. Paist of Philadelphia, who will be the presiding officer at the convention. For the period between conventions, the governing body is the National Board, and of this Mrs. Robert E. Speer of New York is the President.

Among the New York City women expected to attend the convention are Mrs. Robert E. Speer as President of the National Board; Mrs. John D. Rockefeller Jr. as Vice President, Mrs. Arthur Curtiss James, Chairman of the World Service Council; Mrs. John French, Chairman of the Executive Committee; Mrs. Henry Gillespie Myers, President of the New York City branches, and Mr. and Mrs. Dave H. Morris.

Public faith in Cadillac is as old as Cadillac, and as new as the new 90-degree, eight-cylinder Cadillac itself.

This abiding sense that the Cadillac was a thing apart first came into being twenty-three years ago. Eleven years ago Cadillac added immeasurably to its prestige by developing the first eight-cylinder American car.

More than 200,000 of the world's most critical motorists have owned more than 225,000 eight-cylinder Cadillacs—the widest acceptance of the eight-cylinder principle in all the world.

Today's unexampled demand for the new 90-degree, eight-cylinder Cadillac is making motor car history all over again. It is doubling Cadillac sales, which already exceeded that of any other car in its field.

The new Cadillac is years ahead of the times—and new thousands each month turn to it with deepest satisfaction.

SOLVING PROBLEM OF THE USED CAR

Motor Factories Realizing Its Vital Connection With Continued Sales of New Machines —Trade-in Difficulties

ONE of the significant features in connection with the sale of automobiles is the steadily increasing attention given by dealers to the disposition of used cars. A few years ago, when the used or second-hand car sales represented from one-fifth to one-tenth the sales of new cars, the problem presented comparatively little difficulty. The enormous factory production of recent years has altered the situation radically and automobile business success today means that just as many used cars must be sold as new cars, if not more.

"The used car may easily turn out to be the chief factor in 1926 automobile marketing success or failure," says Norman G. Shidle in discussing the attitude of the factories to the used-car condition, in The Automotive Industries, and he adds: "A used car is involved in 75 to 85 per cent. of all new-car sales today, and one and one-half to two times as many used cars as new cars have to be sold by dealers every year. The proportion bids fair to increase rather than decrease."

Visible evidences that the dealers recognize the growing importance of the used-car situation may be seen along the Broadway Automobile Row in the fact that within the last few months several distributers of well-known cars have fitted up elaborate salesrooms for the display of their reconditioned cars. These cars, taken in trade for new models, are thoroughly rebuilt, new parts being used where necessary, and guarantees of good performance given for limited periods.

Under the persistent hammering of the National Automobile Dealers' Association, of which Charles B. Warren, head of the Warren-Nash Company, was elected President early in the year, the used-car business is being conducted, generally speaking, on a scientific basis instead of on the hit-and-miss methods of former years, and which led to such serious losses to hundreds of dealers throughout the country.

Reports from several dealers in this city who have given as careful study to the merchandising of used cars as has been customary with new cars indicate that they are getting rid of their used cars very satisfactorily. Indeed, one of the large Broadway agencies has taken additional space on Broadway and is fitting it up attractively for the display of remade second-hand cars.

The question has been asked, Who buys used cars? In answering this, an executive of one of the local agencies replied:

Used Car Buyers.

"Practically 90 per cent. of the purchasers of used cars are persons who never before owned automobiles. They buy the car not merely because it is somewhat cheaper than the new model but, in the majority of cases, as a trial car. Being new owners they feel they can get all the necessary comfort and service out of the used car while acquiring experience in motor operation and at the end of a year or so they will feel qualified to buy a new car."

If the answer given above is correct it means that every sale of a used car means the possible loss of a new car sale. If no used cars were available probably not all of the 90 per cent. of new owners buying used cars would purchase new models, but considering the low prices at which many excellent cars can be obtained, a fairly large percentage would take the new car. The problem hitherto has been one for the dealer to solve, but within the past year many of the large factories have recognized that dealers cannot profitably sell new cars unless they can get rid of their used cars, taken in trade.

Many dealers frankly admit that the ultimate result will be a leveling down of new car sales. That is, continued record sales of new material cannot be expected in the long run, and it seems probable that the results of this year's motor vehicle production and business will show that a fairly definite average has been reached, which will not vary materially in the near future.

The factories are recognizing as never before that the large stock of used cars in the country has a direct effect upon new car sales, and in some cases comprehensive efforts are being made to assist dealers in working out the problem.

It also is significant to note that the used car situation formed the subject of an evening's talk recently at the automobile salesmanship course now being conducted at the West Side Y. M. C. A. The discussion was led by C. B. Amorous, head of the Wills Sainte Claire Company of New York, who stated that buying the used car is probably the weakest link in selling an automobile and one which salesmen have paid less attention to than any other item.

Mr. Amorous dealt chiefly on the attitude of the salesman in explaining tactfully and clearly to the owner the reason why high values could not economically be granted for the trade-in deal. He advised salesmen to work out the mathematics of the cost of the car to the owner in comparison with the price quoted by the dealer.

Reading Basic Values.

"If his car originally cost $3,000," said Mr. Amorous, "he has in mind that amount of money spent, and the difference between this and what you offer he considers as a loss. If you are going to quote him $1,000 and he has owned it for twenty-four months, one simple method of explaining this is to take his loss of $2,000, which is not a loss but something he has paid for the service of transportation, divide this by twenty-four and you will find that he has paid only $83 a month for his transportation, which is less than any dealer can rent a car to him. When this monthly cost is presented it very often enlightens him and certainly he could not ask for a less rent per month than $83 on a $3,000 car which he has operated himself.

"You must prepare the customer for your quotation and to do so properly you must enlighten him as to the actual expense you will be put to in disposing of his merchandise and as to an honest, fair way to arrive at the value of his car. You might even state that if you were giving him a check for his car without any thought of selling him a new one he would not expect you to purchase the car at more than its worth, and that you could not stay in business if you gave him as much as it is worth to a new purchaser, as your overhead and cost of selling, plus a legitimate profit, would be expected.

"In all purchases of used cars you want to remember that it is a law of barter and exchange, as you are exchanging articles which, from his standpoint, represent currency."

PEERLESS "BIG SIX" SEDAN

Accommodating seven passengers, the Peerless "Big Six" sedan has been designed to provide the maximum amount of room for long-distance touring comfort. The chassis wheelbase is 133 inches. Four-wheel brakes and balloon tires are regular equipment.

MOTOR TRADE ACTIVITIES

HENRY M. CRANE will be the chief speaker at the metropolitan section meeting of the Society of Automotive Engineers next Wednesday night at the Building Trades Club, 24 West Thirty-third Street. The subject will be "Automobile Engines."

Chauncey M. Depew has purchased his second Pierce-Arrow car from the Hartolds Motor Car Company, the New York distributers. It is an enclosed drive limousine mounted on the large six-cylinder chassis, finished in red, with maroon broadcloth upholstery.

The New York branch of the Buick Motor Company announces that it delivered 1,750 new Buicks during the first ten days in April. The largest previous volume for ten days was the last ten-day period of March, 1923, when 1,550 cars were delivered.

Another high record in retail sales in the United States was established by Dodge Brothers' dealers in the week ending April 3, when 9,104 Dodge cars and Graham Brothers trucks were delivered.

The new sedan which was recently announced by the Velie Motors Corporation is being shown by W. A. G. Motors Corporation, at 40 West Sixty-second Street, the local Velie dealer. Lockheed hydraulic four-wheel brakes and balloon tires are standard equipment.

Five Fordson tractors pulling graders are used at Belmont Park—leveling the track after each race. The track is 100 feet wide and is covered by the span of five separately drawn graders. It takes but ten minutes to level the track between races, as compared with an hour to do the same job with horses.

The Peerless Motor Car Corporation has increased its directorate from eleven to thirteen members by the election of Charles H. Larson, New York distributar, and Charles A. Tucker, general sales manager, to the board.

W. Ledyard Mitchell has been appointed Vice President and general manager of operations of the Chrysler Corporation, and H. T. Hafler has been appointed Vice President in charge of manufacturing.

Colin Campbell, Vice President of Durant Motors, announces that 31,605 Star cars were sold during the first quarter of the present year, an increase of 12,495 over the same period last year.

The F. B. Stearns Company of Cleveland announces that more than $500,000 have been expended in factory improvements since the new management took charge three months ago.

The largest factory in the world devoted exclusively to the manufacture of automobile generators began operations at Anderson, Ind., on April 1. It is an addition to the plants of the Remy Electric Company, a division of the General Motors Corporation. The building is one story in height, covering two and three-quarter acres of ground, the building being 520 feet long and 233 1-3 feet in width.

The New York branch of the Buick Motor Company has opened a salesroom at 230th Street and Broadway for the convenience of its customers in the Inwood and Spuyten Duyvil sections.

T. S. Johnston, manager of the Flint New York factory branch, states that the new co-incidental transmission lock embodied in the 1926 models has caused the insurance companies to give Flint cars a rating for the lowest theft insurance rate.

Production of Oakland and Pontiac cars aggregated 12,025 in March. More than 10,000 Pontiacs were produced and sold during the first three months of the year.

The Nash Motors Company today reports that for the first quarter of 1926, after deducting general expenses and providing for local income taxes, the net income for the Nash and the Ajax Motors Company amounted to $4,137,503, as compared to $3,099,232 for the period a year ago.

THRIFT A BIG FACTOR IN MOTOR CAR COST

IN preparing a budget for the annual expense of a motor car, a liberal allowance should be made, states H. Clifford Brokaw, technical adviser of the West Side Y. M. C. A. Automobile School, for gasoline, oil, insurance, license plates and miscellaneous repairs. He advises setting something aside to replace worn-out tires and another reserve should be figured for replacing the present car with a new one when its usefulness ceases. Some owners set aside cash for two new tires each year and one-fifth of the car's cost toward a new machine. These amounts will depend on the use to which the car is to be put and the general care it receives. If one-fifth of the sale price is set aside each year a new machine can be purchased every five years.

"In estimating the cost of operating an automobile," adds Mr. Brokaw, "the experienced owner can arrive at fairly tenable conclusions by extending his former motor bills. The new owner will have to guess somewhat at his costs for the first year.

"The owner knows about what gasoline and oil costs per gallon and he can get a fairly accurate idea of the sum needed for fuel. He can easily learn the cost of his license plates and his driver's license.

"If he is wise enough to insure his car properly against loss by fire and theft and against loss by running into some one or some one's property or being run into by others, he can estimate the cost of this protection. If he does not see the wisdom of such an insurance expense at the start of the year he cannot tell within thousands of dollars what may be his motoring cost during the twelve months' period. One accident may set him back financially more dollars than the original cost of the car.

"The motorist who consistently takes the best possible care of his machine is the genuinely thrifty owner. He knows that such consideration will keep his car at its maximum second-hand value. It will also give him more years of good service."

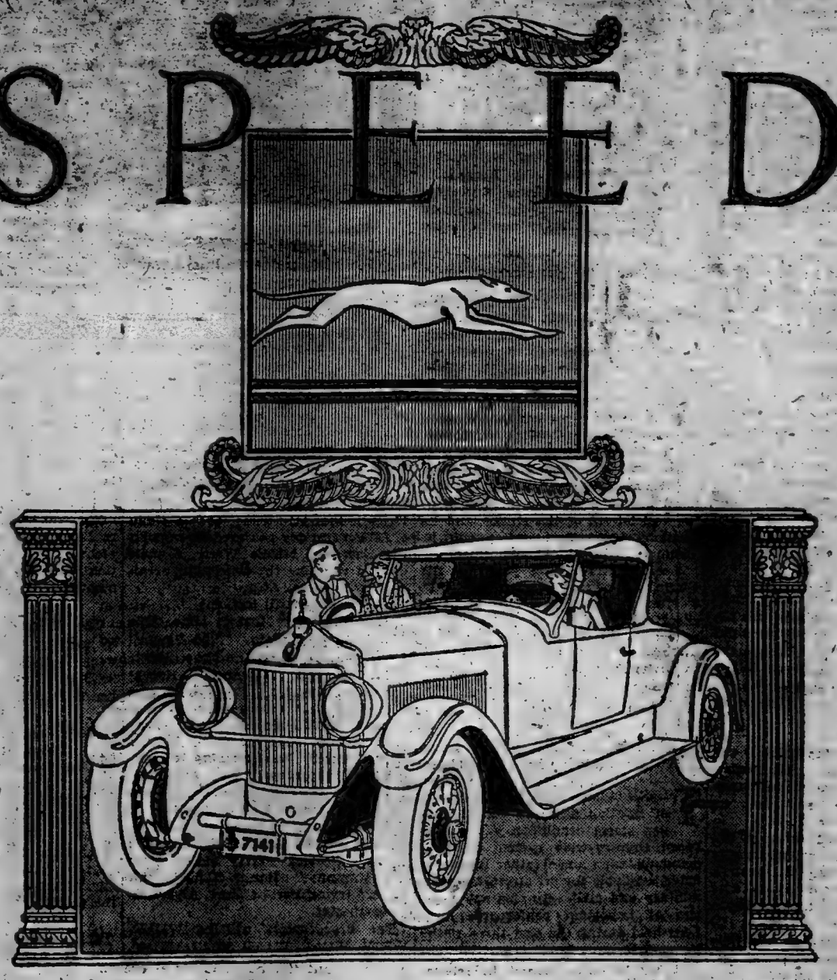
SPEED



WHEN FAST TRAINS ARE NOT AVAILABLE!

BIG Business frequently dictates—sometimes it ruthlessly commands: Go immediately! Come at once! ¶ Recently, "the command" came to Samuel Klein of Chicago. Mr. Klein, the owner of a chain of retail jewelry stores, found that in order to keep an important business engagement in Milwaukee, he would have to be there inside of two hours—and not a train available. He made the run (97½ miles) in his Diana Light Straight Eight Roadster in exactly 1 hour and 50 minutes, or within five minutes of the fastest train time. ¶ So, now, Mr. Klein is a convert to the Diana Transportation System. He drives by choice. His time from Chicago to Davenport, Iowa (188 miles) is precisely 3 hours and 20 minutes, bettering the fastest train by 66 minutes. His time from Chicago to Springfield, Illinois (200 miles) is 3 hours and 39 minutes, trimming the fastest express train by 19 minutes. ¶ Mr. Klein's three splendid records are Diana Records. They are all supported by affidavits from official observers. They have never been equalled by any other make stock car.

They prove conclusively that in the Diana Straight Eight you get power and pull plus speed when and where you need it.

Now drive the car yourself—try it out. Every Diana claim is clinched with a Diana Demonstration.

WHT MAKES CHANGES IN OPERATING POLICY

THREE important changes have been made in the operating policy of WHT, Chicago, according to the announcement of H. J. Bligh, manager of the station.

Announcements concerning selections to be broadcast will be limited in length. The name of the performer, his selection, and the call letters of the station will precede the number. Following the selection will be the name of the performer, his selection, the call letters of the station and its location. All other matter will be eliminated from the announcements.

A second change in policy is the elimination of the program from 6 to 7 Monday evenings. This night is silent in Chicago, and while station officials regarded it as no breach of agreement to continue their program until Mondays, they decided to broadcast nothing after 6 o'clock so that local listeners might have more opportunity to get distance stations.

AIRPLANE RADIO SERVICE TO BE EXTENDED

THERE is not likely to be repetition of aviation disasters due to sudden storm conditions if the proposed country-wide system of radio communication and weather reports is made available for all aircraft, naval, military and civil. To this end a series of important conferences have been held during the past three weeks by various navy bureaus on the subject of providing adequate radio communications for aircraft.

As a result of the conferences, the modernization program for shore radio stations has been revised to incorporate the development necessary at aircraft stations. It has been found practicable to adopt a plan which will provide for the exchange of weather information between air stations in the New York-Washington-Norfolk area. These bulletins will be available for all radio-equipped aircraft in flight.

It is expected that this plan will be in daily operation within one month. Other emergency messages will be exchanged. This general plan is being discussed with representatives of the Army Signal Corps and the Army Air Service with a view to reaching an agreement within the services for a well-coordinated military program. After this is attained, the parts of the plan which are of interest to the civil departments of the Government who are concerned with aviation, such as the Department of Commerce, Post Office and Weather Bureau, will be discussed with them.

In recent tests between army and navy airplanes all messages were successfully delivered, and the average time of origin to time of receipt via radio and land line telegraph was slightly less than two minutes.

"MERCHANT OF VENICE" ON RADIO TODAY OVER TWO STATIONS

THE dramatic incidents surrounding Shakespeare's characters—Shylock, Antonio, Portia and Bassanio—will be portrayed in the tabloid version of "The Merchant of Venice," to be produced by the WEAF Shakespearean players tonight from 5:50 to 7 o'clock through WEAF and WJAR.

The play will be under the direction of Katherine Emmet. In addition to Miss Emmet the following members of the Shakespearean players will have rôles in this production: Lawrence Cecil, Alfred Shirley, Gertrude Phillips, Charles Warburton and Gerald Stopp.

The story reveals that the young merchant, Antonio, in order to accommodate his friend, Bassanio, in courtship, borrows money from his hated business enemy, Shylock. Shylock lends this sum of money to Antonio on condition that if it is not repaid by a certain day Antonio will forfeit to Shylock one pound of his flesh. As Bassanio is about to marry the fair Portia, news comes to him from his friend Antonio that the ships—the cargo of which Antonio expected to use in repaying the loan to Shylock—had been lost at sea and that Shylock was insistent that the original bond be fulfilled as executed. Bassanio hastens away to the trial of his friend, and in the meantime Portia disguises herself and attends the trial in the guise of a lawyer.

Although Shylock is offered the sum of money borrowed by Antonio, he shows no mercy and insists on a compliance of the terms of the bond. Portia, as the counsel, agrees that the bond is regular in every respect and that Shylock is entitled to its fulfillment. However, as Shylock with his sharp knife is about to exact the penalty of his bond, Portia dazzles and electrifies the proceedings by calling attention to the fact that the bond distinctly specifies "a pound of flesh" and that if one drop of blood were lost in the process of its being taken Shylock would be guilty before the law. As Shylock is unable to comply with the terms of the bond and meet these conditions he is adjudged by the Duke as guilty under the law of Venice of conspiring to take the life of a citizen and his vast wealth is forfeited.

The seeming tragedy ends with joy, and the closing incidents surround Bassanio and his explanation to Portia of the loss of a ring which she gave him and which he had given away upon request of the counsel, who was none other than Portia herself. At the same time a message arrives apprising Antonio of the fact that his ships were safe.

A collection of rare violins to be played at the Wanamaker Auditorium Tuesday from 9 to 10 P. M. will be broadcast by WJZ. This collection, made by Rodman Wanamaker, is said to be one of the most important in America. It contains four Stradivarii, representing three periods of the master's activity—the youthful, the golden and the swan. The last is represented by the famous Chant du Cygne or the "Swan" itself, the last violin made by Stradivarius in 1737, the year of his death, at the age of 93.

Other instruments include examples of Montagnana, Guadagnini, Ruger, Tecchler and Gofriller, as well as many rare bows. A chamber orchestra composed of prominent members of the Philharmonic Society of New York will play upon these instruments under the direction of Henry Hadley, American composer and assistant conductor of the Philharmonic Society of New York.

The famous Stradivarius known as the Swan will be played in solos by Scipione Guidi, concert master of the Philharmonic Orchestra. Charles M. Courboin, famous Belgian-American organist, will play the organ, while Dr. Alexander Russell will be at the piano.

The WGY Orchestra will be augmented for the occasion and a trio of bagpipe players will assist in producing the atmosphere of the land of the thistle.

TOLL BROADCASTERS HOPE TO SHOW PROFIT

TOLL broadcasting, sponsored by advertisers, has not reached a paying basis, according to W. E. Harkness, an official of WEAF, in a statement made at the hearings on the copyright bills in Washington last week. He said that some of the stations were taking in considerable revenue but the expenses of operation soon used it up.

Mr. Harkness said that the American Telephone and Telegraph Company hope to show a profit from broadcasting this year.

He told of a test made by broadcasting one act of a certain play in New York, after which the box office sale was declared to have been increased by 3,000 tickets. He said that John McCormack singing over the radio had brought in 60,000 orders for a single record. A client had received 500,000 letters from listeners in connection with a certain popular radio feature.

Gene Buck, President of the Society of Authors, Composers and Publishers, said that radio had caused the sale of sheet music to drop 50 per cent.

"Charles K. Harris, who wrote 'After the Ball' back in 1892," said Mr. Buck, "before piano players, phonographs or other mechanical reproducers were in vogue, made more money out of that song than Irving Berlin made out of 'Remember,' recently composed and put on the air with the aid of radio and all the mechanical reproduction agencies."

WEATHER REPORTS FOR BALLOONISTS

Weather reports for the benefit of balloonists in the national elimination balloon race to be sailed from Little Rock, Ark., on April 29, will be broadcast by many stations throughout the East and Midwest. Station WJZ will send out the reports on April 29 and 30.

INFLUENCE OF BROADCASTING HAS IMPROVED MARINE RADIO

Vacuum Tube Transmitters Minimized Code Interference Caused by Spark Sets and Improved Service Ashore and Afloat

SIX years of broadcasting have had an important influence on radio communication between ship and shore commercial stations, according to a report made to the Institute of Radio Engineers by T. M. Stevens of the Radio Corporation of America.

At the termination of the World War the navy had control of commercial wireless along the coast, and was severely pressed for competent radio personnel because of demobilization. It became necessary to close many shore stations due to personnel shortage in order to man the fleets, compass stations and, so far as the navy was concerned, the most strategical stations on land.

In the early Summer of 1920 one of the larger radio companies found it necessary to establish a system of coastal stations in order to maintain prompt and efficient public service. This was several months before KDKA radiated the first broadcast program, on Nov. 2, 1920.

Chain of Spark Stations.

Spark transmitters rated at 2 kilowatts were installed at New York and on Cape Cod, and others were soon placed in service at Cape May, N. J.; Babylon, L. I.; Brooklyn, New London, Newport, Siasconnet, Boston, Otter Cliffs, Me.; Rockland, Me., and Easthampton, L. I. All operated on two wave lengths, 600 and 450 meters, and these channels handled 90 per cent. of the traffic to and from vessels at sea.

Then broadcasting began, and the public complained of code interference from passenger ships nearing the American shore, and the shore stations caused untold disturbances for the broadcast concerts.

In his report to the Institute of Radio Engineers Mr. Stevens said:

"It was fortunate that vacuum tube radio telegraph transmitters made their appearance simultaneously with broadcasting. The first vacuum tube transmitter for commercial telegraph use in the United States was installed at Marion, Mass. (WCC). It was operated on 2,200 meters, distantly controlled from the receiving station at Chatham. A few of the transatlantic passenger vessels were by this time equipped with either arc or tube transmitting attachments. The shipboard operators, as well as those at Chatham, were astounded at the remarkable distances covered with the tube sets. The larger ships began to use the long-wave channel almost exclusively for their traffic, and it became necessary to provide additional channels at the Chatham station. The shipboard transmitter could be quickly shifted from 2,100 meters (the calling wave used by ships) to 2,000, 1,900 and 1,800 meters. Thus Chatham could receive from three ships and transmit to a fourth vessel at one and the same time.

Tubes Increased Range.

"The use of the vacuum tube transmitters not only increased the range of marine communication, but greatly facilitated the movement of traffic due to possibilities of multiplex operation, and, by the removal of heavy loads from the shorter wave lengths, aided the smaller ships in moving their traffic.

"The increased range also resulted in making unnecessary the further operation of numerous stations along the Atlantic Coast. The Otter Cliffs station practically ceased commercial activities; stations at Rockland, Me.; Newport, Siasconset, New London, Babylon and Cape May were closed.

"As broadcasting activities rapidly expanded the elimination of spark stations was pushed with all possible speed," said Mr. Stevens. "The Bush Terminal 5-kilowatt spark gave way to a tube transmitter which radiated a sharper wave and minimized code interference in the New York area. To the Chatham station were added two 5-kilowatt long-wave transmitters and two short-wave sets. The Tuckerton station, which replaced Cape May, used a 5-kilowatt transmitter, and a 1-kilowatt tube set replaced the 5-kilowatt installation at Boston. Chicago, Galveston, Los Angeles and San Francisco were also equipped with tubes in place of the sparks.

Ship Equipment Improved.

"The vacuum tube type of apparatus, having proved its superiority in the marine field, is now rapidly replacing sets of the spark type, not only on land but aboard ship. Several types of tube transmitters have been designed specially for ship installations, ranging in power from 200 watts in the antenna to 8 kilowatts. A 200-watt set on a ship of average size has a daylight range of from 400 to 600 miles under normal conditions, with a night range of about 1,500 miles. Another type of transmitter delivers 500 to 750 watts to the antenna, giving a daylight range of at least 1,000 miles under normal circumstances, with much greater range during the hours of darkness."

EUROPEANS ADOPT NEW WAVE PLAN

AN international broadcasting conference has concluded its work at Geneva and has issued a report relative to the reallocation of European wave lengths planned to eliminate interference between stations.

Tests were started in September and continued to March 25, after which radio representatives of the various countries met at Geneva to consider a new wave length plan based on the information derived from the tests.

The new plan divides broadcasting stations into two classes:

1. Every country will receive one wave length exclusive to itself; but in some cases a country may be given several of these exclusive wave lengths, their needs being adjudged from the standpoints of population, geographical area or educational requirements.

2. Very low-power stations, widely separated from each other, will work on exactly the same wave length, without causing interference, either within the area which they were built to serve or outside that area. Two or more stations working on identical wave lengths will be called "common" wave length stations.

The Technical Committee is considering the standardization of wavemeters because it has been found, for example, that the British measure their wave lengths by one wavemeter and the Germans by another, and if they differ .5 per cent. interference is created to disturb the listeners of all Europe.

It was decided by the conference to appoint three commissioners to deal with problems which arise in broadcasting and to speed up their solution.

He will show you how the shielding of each stage of radio frequency amplification permits use of a third stage—without interstage coupling: thus giving 8 times more amplification to the detector as well as approximately 50% more selectivity.

He will explain how the heavy copper shields prevent any signal, other than that to which the antenna is tuned, from entering the receiver;—how these shields make possible perfect neutralization of each radio frequency stage, thus eliminating any possibility of radiation and consequent discomfort to your neighbors. He also will show you that the shield which surrounds the detector stage prevents distortion due to feed-back from the 2nd audio stage.

All this can be explained at the store. But it is in your home that the real understanding of the advantages of total shielding awaits you. There you will appreciate the range and selectivity which results from this shielding—and the splendid reception obtained when every note from the lowest musical tone to the highest audible overtone is perfectly reproduced.

RADIO NEWS AND COMMENT AMONG THE BROADCASTERS

"PIED PIPER" WILL PLAY OVER FOURTEEN STATIONS

Story With Original Dialect and Musical Setting Will Be on the Air Tuesday—Other Features This Week

THE Pied Piper of Hamelin," by Robert Browning, will form the basis of the program to be given Tuesday evening from 9 to 10 o'clock, Eastern Standard Time, through WEAF, WEEI, WFI, WCAE, WGR, WWJ, WOC, KSD, WJAR, WCCO, WTAG, WGN, WEAR and WSAI.

The story of the Pied Piper deals with a certain community which is besieged with rats and has found no adequate way of exterminating them. The Pied Piper arrives in the town and promises to rid the community from the pest of the rodents if he be paid a large fee for so doing. The Town Fathers, anxious to be rid of the cured of the rats, agree with alacrity to this payment and the Piper begins his work. He plays upon his magic instrument, and at once the thousands of rats leave their homes and stores of the town and scamper after the magic music. The Piper leads them to the river and the rats by the thousands rush headlong into the swirling water and are drowned.

The ease with which the Piper had rid the city of the long-tailed rodents seemed to justify the officials refusing the payment which they had promised. After their refusal to make the stipulated payment the Pied Piper goes out again, making music on his instrument, with the result that all the children of the town follow in his steps. He takes them to a cave, where they are confined for a long time, until the childless parents of the city are not only willing but eager to pay him the contracted fee. The complete story, using much of Browning's original dialect, accompanied by musical settings, will be given during this hour's program.

Artists who will participate will be Betsy Ayres, soprano; Rosa Bryant, contralto; Charles Harrison, tenor, and Wilfred Glenn, basso. The Chamber Orchestra will be under the direction of Max Jacobs.

HAWAII AND SOUTH AFRICA LINKED BY AMATEUR RADIO

WHAT is believed to be a world's record for two-way short-wave communication was established recently when the Fort Shafter Signal Corps station at Honolulu, operating on a wave length of 38.5 meters, carried on a thirty-five minute chat with Amateur Station OA4V, located at Johannesburg, South Africa. After exchanging greetings between the two countries a daily schedule was arranged.

The estimated distance the message was sent is between 11,000 and 12,000 miles. Strong signals were reported by both parties.

The South African message was received at Honolulu at 6:15 P. M.

The Hawaiian station, operated by Sergeant H. W. Wilson, transmits under the amateur call 6CDF, and is also the experimental station for the Signal Corps at Fort Shafter. At the time the communication was effected very low power was used.

QUESTIONS AND ANSWERS

By ORRIN E. DUNLAP Jr.

QUESTION—Can a CX-112 be used as a detector with four regular tubes used as amplifiers? (2) Does the CX-112 influence the volume, tone or distance? (3) In using a loop antenna how must it be connected to the set? (4) I understand a condenser must be used. If so, what kind and how must it be connected?—E. O. Answer—The CX-112 is a power amplifier tube designed for use in the last stage of audio frequency amplification. It requires a plate potential of 135 volts and a grid bias or "C" battery of nine volts. (2) A power tube can handle a greater load than the ordinary amplifier tube, and for that reason there is less distortion and greater volume can be obtained. An audio amplifier does not increase the distance range of a receiver. The sensitiveness of the detector and parts of the set ahead of the detector, including antenna and ground, govefns the range so far as the receiver is concerned, providing the batteries are up to standard. (3) It depends upon the type of circuit, but generally the loop can be connected across the antenna and ground binding posts of the receiver. A loop cannot be used with a neutrodyne efficiently unless changes are made in the tuning circuit. (4) Usually a seven plate condenser is employed across the terminals of the loop.

Question—I have a Ware three-tube neutrodyne. I use it a great deal and am bothered with the dry batteries running down quickly. They last about two weeks. Can I substitute larger tubes for the UV-199s and then use a storage battery? (2) Would I need a different rheostat?—I. F. Answer—The design of the set would make it difficult to change the sockets to fit a six-volt storage battery type tubes. The most convenient and economical thing to do would be to use a four-volt storage battery in place of the dry batteries used to light the filaments and continue to use the set and tubes already in use. (2) No.

Question—What is the power output of Station KGW, Portland, Ore.?—B. S. W. Answer—1,000 watts.

Question—I have a Radiola 25 which I have been using connected direct with the catacomb. Results are good on clear nights, with remarkable distance reception, as I have heard OAX, Lima, Peru, and AQM, San Salvador, from my location here in Louisiana. But on our frequent nights of heavy static in this climate any sort of reception is impossible. When formerly used with the regular loop much static was eliminated, but now I find that reception with the loop is barely perceptible, even when coupled to a wave trap. Batteries and tubes are O. K. and results with outside antenna very good as formerly. Does the continued use of an outside aerial affect loop reception? (2) Will an underground aerial be more effective in cutting down static? (3) Should the set be grounded when directly coupled to an outside aerial?—H. W. A. Answer—No; the outside antenna and loop can be used interchangeably without any detrimental effect, providing the correct connections are made in switching from one to the other. (2) Experiments with underground antenna show that the static volume is reduced, but generally the signal strength is reduced in proportion. (3) A good plan for connecting an outdoor wire with a Radiola 25 is as follows: Make the lead-in wire long enough to wind into a coil of wire about nine inches in diameter, consisting of about six turns, and leave enough wire over to connect with the cold-water pipe. Then place the coil close to the loop. Tune the set as usual and then move the coil in different positions in relation to the loop until the signals are loudest.

Question—Kindly inform me the proper method of testing "C" batteries. The usual voltmeter is not marked off for four and one-half volts, so I cannot test the battery with such a device. I have been told that the batteries are useless at one volt or less. (2) I have been told by a salesman in one of the largest radio stores in New York that they have found from past experience that "B" eliminators are entirely impractical because they pick up all outside electrical interference from machines used in manufacturing places and stores so that there is a buzzing noise and lack of clearness. He said that they no longer sell the "B" battery eliminators but recommend "B" batteries. Please give your opinion.—F. W. Answer—Use a voltmeter designed to read lower than 4½ volts. The majority of voltmeters on sale at radio shops are designed to cover the 22½ volts and 45-volt "B" batteries. (2) There are several "B" battery eliminators on the market which give good service, and with the properly designed devices there is no hum or buzz from the alternating current lines. It may be that the interfering noises were picked up by the set itself, as is often the case.

Question—What is likely to be the effect of the test case in Chicago regarding the "stealing" of a wave length by WJAZ?—J. E. T. Answer—It is contended in radio circles that the only effect of the decision will be the determining of the right of the Secretary of Commerce to place restrictions as to wave lengths on a certain limited class of broadcasting stations. Regulation 15 of the Radio Communication laws, as enacted by Congress in 1912, reads as follows: "No private or commercial station not engaged in the transaction of bona fide commercial business by radio communication or in experimentation in connection with the development and manufacture of radio apparatus for commercial purposes shall use a transmitting wave length exceeding 200 meters, or a transformer input exceeding one kilowatt, except by special authority of the Secretary of Commerce contained in the license of the station."

The question raised in the Chicago test case is whether or not the Secretary of Commerce has the right to arbitrarily assign wave lengths and hours of operation to stations engaged in one of the two above described classes. The Zenith Radio Corporation comes within the latter class. The majority of radio stations are not in either class, and no broadcasting station other than those engaged in the two special classes described by Congress can operate on a wave length in excess of 200 meters, without special authority from the Department of Commerce. No one has ever claimed otherwise, according to S. F. McDonald Jr. of Station WJAZ.

POLISH MUSICALE.

An orchestral program of Polish music will be radiated by WJZ tomorrow night from 8 to 8:30 o'clock. The last half of the concert, from 8:30 to 9 o'clock, will consist of popular dance selections and tenor solos.

BROADCASTING CHURCH SERVICE KEEPS CONTROL OPERATOR BUSY

Radioman Sits With Choir and Controls Microphones—KGO Has Rule, "Keep Cool and Keep Your Eye on the Minister"

BROADCASTING of San Francisco church services through station KGO has developed a rule for operators assigned to the control apparatus placed in churches as a necessary link between the microphone and the transmitter. The rule is, "Keep cool and keep your eye on the minister."

The operator at the church is kept busy, especially in Trinity Church, San Francisco, where eight microphones are employed. Each microphone lead terminates in the control unit, a box about the size of a suitcase, which is placed in front of the operator seated in the choir section.

In telling of his experiences in forwarding religious ceremonies from San Francisco over land wires to the transmitter of KGO, Operator Donald De Wolf said:

"Even if I am all rigged out in choir vestments, I do not have to sing nor do anything but watch the minister. I must watch him to know which switch to pull on the control unit to get the right microphone on the air. When the minister sits down I know that something is going to happen in some other part of the building. But where—what? Perhaps it is the organ on the north side. Maybe it is the organ on the south side. Or maybe it will be the echo organ over the front entrance, about a hundred feet from where I sit. Perhaps it is a visiting minister put into the service at the last moment, without my knowledge, who jumps up without formal presentation. Then it might be a solo from a member of the choir. But no matter what, it is up to the operator to get the right microphone into the circuit.

Duty of Control Operator.

"The control man's job is to have the microphone in front of the echo device in the circuit when the organ is echoing. Otherwise radio listeners tuned in on KGO would notice large gaps in their services. I have a headset on, in addition to the choir vestments and a worried look, and I am able all the time to hear through the amplifiers. In the power house, which is across San Francisco Bay, ten miles from the church, the KGO power house operator is listening in. The services are delivered to him free from noise and as clear as possible, and he puts it on the air that way. A magneto telephone into which I whisper connects me with the power house operator.

"When the minister moves from one position to another I have to switch quickly the new microphone into the circuit. In fact, some of the time, when he is moving, there are two microphones working. This keeps the service going without breaks, so far as the listener is concerned.

"Once in a church I 'lose' the minister. I take what I think is a high enough point of observation for the control outfit. But when the choir stands up to sing I cannot see the minister. I feel sure he will go to one of the microphones to speak. But which one? So I connect up all the microphones he is likely to get in front of. Then when the choir sits down I 'find' the minister, and noiselessly eliminate all microphones but the one he is near.

"Our microphones, the condenser type, are very sensitive. The first amplifier, which should be placed not more than twenty-five feet from the microphone, is located inconspicuously. It must be out of the way of any one kicking it, or away from the floor or wall vibrations. Once I had to get a couple of pillows to put under the amplifier to keep the vibration of the floor from causing it to be 'microphonic' when the minister walked around. If I hadn't done that, listeners would have heard something like 'bong, bong' every time he took a step."

Instructing the Minister.

The pick-up man's job is also an educational one. He must at times educate the minister and the organist in the fine points of good radio pick-up. This is done, according to De Wolf, in the following manner:

"I generally try to have a rehearsal. Then I get the minister to put on earphones and listen in. First, I rattle some papers before the microphone. And he's likely to ask me, 'Where's all that sheet from?' Next, I have somebody drop a lead pencil on the amplifier case. There is a slight 'bong.' After stunts like this the minister is usually convinced that there are certain rules of the pick-up game which have to be observed, the same as in preaching.

"The organist must also be instructed. When he plays on the echo organ, away up in the rafters over the front entrance, my echo organ microphone, placed near the sound, is in the circuit. Suppose, without warning, he jumps down into the low tones in the basement. I have to switch that microphone on, before listeners can hear. Naturally he sees right away that I ought to be notified when he jumps around in the music. The best system is to have the ear-phones handy and let him listen in and learn from practical experience. It's the way it sounds that counts in radio."

SCALE OF MUSIC FEES FOR BROADCASTERS

WHEN asked at the Congressional hearings for a figure which he thought reasonable for the broadcasting of copyrighted compositions, W E Harkness, Assistant Vice President of the American Telephone and Telegraph Company of New York, furnished the following scale of compensation:

Five to 100 watts, 2 cents per rendition; 100-500, 4 cents; 500-1,000, 7 cents; 1,000-3,000, 13 cents; 3,000-5,000, 18 cents; over 5,000 watts, 60 cents.

The last figure of 60 cents is calculated for 50 K. W. stations. Rates would undoubtedly be established between 5,000 watts and 50,000 watts. These would probably vary from 18 to 60 cents, according to power.

EAR POOR JUDGE OF SOUND INTENSITY

THE human ear is a poor gauge for sound intensity, according to Dr. Fulting Cutting of the Colonial Radio Corporation.

"Few people realize the enormous range of the human ear," said Dr. Cutting. "In pitch, a good, youthful ear can hear all tones from as low as sixteen vibrations per second to as high as 40,000 per second. The range of intensity is likewise enormous. If we take as one the strength of the weakest sound we can hear, then the strength of the ordinary talking voice will be a million.

"In estimating the relative strength of sounds our ears deceive us. For instance, when asking people about the comparative strength of two radio sets, I have often heard them say that one set was twice as loud as another. When they say that, they do not understand the peculiarities of the ear. On being questioned, they agree that the stronger set behaves as if it had one more stage of amplification than the weaker set. Now one more stage of amplication represents 200 times the power output, yet it seems only twice as loud. In other words, our ears are very poor at gauging the intensity of sound. This is a very necessary condition. If our ears were sensitive to changes in intensity, they would either be insensitive to weak sounds or moderately loud noises would become unbearable.

"The degree of the ear's insensitiveness to loudness can be well illustrated by the fact that it is difficult to distinguish between two sounds, one of which is twice as strong as the other. To successfully make the differentiation, it is necessary that both sounds have the same pitch, the same quality of timbre, and that the comparison be rapid. If as much as thirty seconds is allowed to elapse between listening to the two sounds, no conclusion as to relative strength could be relied upon."

TRADE NEWS AND COMMENT

A CONE type loud-speaker equipped with a soundboard has been introduced by the Stromberg-Carlson Telephone Manufacturing Company.

The soundboard, which takes the form of a wide ring of wood especially suited for sound vibrations, and upon the inner edge of which the cone itself is mounted, adds a fullness and timbre to the lower notes.

The speaker is being made in the form of a tip-top table, the cone and soundboard imitating the flat surface of the table in its vertical position and being fitted with pedestal and legs.

Another feature of the speaker is the use of an extra long cord, twenty feet or more in length, allowing the device to be placed at some distance from the receiver. This makes possible the placing of the speaker in any convenient location in the room for the best acoustical effect and allows a greater perfection of reproduction by preventing acoustic coupling between the speaker and the receiver.

Two radio shows are scheduled for New York the week of Sept. 10-17, the Radio World's Fair to be held in Madison Square Garden and the National Radio Exposition at the Grand Central Palace. There are indications in radio circles that this will be the last year to have two shows in New York at the same time.

The National Radio Exposition Corporation organized by leading manufacturers for the purpose of conducting radio expositions issued the following statement to the stockholders of the organization last week: "It is generally agreed that the conduct by certain cities of competing shows by rival promoters is a serious burden on the industry.

"This situation is particularly acute in New York, where for several years competing shows have been held.

"The directors are confident that after this year there will be only one radio show in New York."

A direct-current voltmeter, a portable instrument designed especially for use with radio receiving sets and known as type DO-3 has been introduced by the General Electric Company. The instrument has a double scale, 0-7.5 and 0-150 volts, which combinations are most suited for measuring filament and plate voltages ("A" and "B" batteries).

The DO-3 instrument may be mounted on a panel if desired, but will probably be more useful as a portable instrument. It operates on the D'Arsonval principle, is of unusually rugged construction, and is accurate to a high degree.

The resistance of the 7.5-volt circuit is approximately 500 ohms, and of the 150-volt circuit 10,000 ohms, or 66 ohms per volt. Consequently the drain on either "A" or "B" batteries is negligible. Each instrument is supplied with a set of 18-inch leads with terminals.

The voltmeter is of use in several ways. It permits a close check on filament voltage and, since any increase above rated voltage materially reduces the life of a tube, it will prolong the usefulness of tubes. Similarly a quick test on individual "B" batteries will show which one has fallen below its useful life and should therefore be discarded. The instrument also assists in locating circuit troubles by tests for continuity of circuits.

Exports of radio apparatus from the United States totaled $543,972 in February, 1926, as against $477,591 for the corresponding period of 1925 and $499,659 for January, 1926, according to the Department of Commerce.

Of the total February shipments of radio apparatus, receiving sets accounted for $172,910 and receiving set accessories and components for $272,000. There was also a heavy demand for batteries and a marked increase was registered in this class.

A charger that supplies current into a radio battery just fast enough to compensate for the energy drawn off and supplies that current while the radio set is in operation, has been developed by the General Electric Company. It is of the type known as the trickle charger and its trade name is the G-E Tungar trickle charger, supplementing the present line of Tungar battery chargers.

The Tungar trickle charger can be used twenty-four hours a day, as it does not disturb reception except on very sensitive sets. If the owner prefers to disconnect the charger during reception, it is merely necessary to pull out the plug which connects the device with the house lighting circuit.

The charger has four taps which provide three different low rates and a one-half-ampere boosting rate. This makes it possible to obtain the exact rate required for any particular set. The machine draws only a slight amount of power from the line, only 14 watts being taken on the low tap and, even with the boosting rate, the power consumed is but 27 watts.

STATIC BARRIER TO NEWS BETWEEN THE AMERICAS

IT was prophesied by the first Pan-American Journalists Conference at Washington that radio in the future will be a powerful influence in developing a better understanding and in bringing North, Central and South America closer together. As one speaker phrased it, radio would bring these far away nations "as close together as Washington and Chicago are today."

Representatives of the twenty-one countries to the south of us seemed to be in agreement that the reason they knew so little about us and we knew so little about them was the present high cost of communication between the two countries, resulting in a considerable curtailment of news about the United States in South American papers and vice versa.

One who expressed himself as believing that radio would solve this problem eventually was Senor Don Ernesto Montenegro, editor of El Mercurio, Santiago, Chile, who said:

"On the subject of transmission of international news we find our Latin American press almost entirely dependent on submarine cable service. Everything points to the possibility that in the not distant future the unexplained irregularities in the radio service will be eliminated and the radio made one of the regular carriers of news for newspaper consumption, but it is most likely that the cable companies will not be a poor competitor, but a prosperous partner in the enterprise."

"Both by cable and wireless the news is flashed across the water," Frank B. Noyes, President of the Associated Press explained. "Sometimes conditions are highly favorable to the use of the wireless and the radio then is extensively used. At other times, the times of trouble being experienced along the air routes the shift is the other way. On highly important bulletins, nothing is left to chance, and they are flashed both by radio and cable and frequently not only over one cable but all cable routes.

"European news," Mr. Noyes continued, "can be brought to New York at press rates of from 5 to 13½ cents a word, according to the place from which it is sent, whereas it cannot, for example, be delivered to Buenos Aires for less than 17 to 23½ cents a word. Notwithstanding the tendency of these high rates to restrict the quantity of news, the maximum number of words sent to the principal members of The Associated Press in South America is nearly 5,000 words daily, and it can be safely said that as a group South American newspapers pay more for their news than any others of equal number in the world. Indeed, La Nacion of Buenos Aires, pays much the largest single assessment in our organization."

MANY STATIONS TO USE DAYLIGHT SAVING TIME

THE majority of broadcasting stations in the East and Midwest will operate on Daylight Saving Time, beginning Sunday, April 25.

Stations using daylight saving time will broadcast their regular features at the same hours as under Eastern Standard Time. For example, a regular program beginning at 8 P. M., Eastern Standard Time, today, will be heard at 8 P. M., Eastern Daylight Saving Time, next Sunday.

WGY's Monday evening agricultural program will be broadcast at 8:15 o'clock, Daylight Saving Time, instead of on Eastern Standard Time, in order to be more favorable for rural communities. WGY will complete its Monday evening schedule at 9:30, Daylight Saving Time.

WLS NOW RADIATES SETTING-UP EXERCISES

The first broadcasting period of WLS, Chicago, now is at 6:30 o'clock in the morning, when the Central Young Men's Christian Association broadcasts setting-up exercises. Another schedule of the setting-up exercises is broadcast at 7 o'clock and at 7:30 o'clock the Family Worship League holds its meeting on the air through WLS. This religious service is conducted by the Chicago Church Federation, one pastor doing the broadcasting for a week at a time.

FRENCH LABOR WASTE SHOWN IN BANK STRIKE

Excess of Employes in Government and Business Weakens the Nation's Economic Organization—Amusing Instances of Public and Private Red Tape

By BECKLES WILLSON.

THERE is one cardinal weakness in the economic life of contemporary France which never fails to provoke wonder in the bosom of a stranger. When you meet it persistently, incessantly and at close quarters, and recognize its implications, you begin to understand much that baffled you before.

It is that in so many departments of commerce and industry, certainly throughout the whole of the bureaucracy, two and often three individuals are performing what should be the labor of a single one.

Take, to begin with, the case of the banks. They are notoriously overstaffed, as compared with English or American banks. Not long ago there was a strike of bank clerks. Twenty thousand of them, dissatisfied with their pay, walked out one fine morning. What happened? The managers merely readjusted, revised, and in some cases suppressed, the work of their respective offices, and, with only a third of the staff remaining, the business of the banks went on as before. Labor is qualitative as well as quantitative.

No wonder there is no "unemployment" in France when so many hands and brains are doing things which in other countries and under a stricter system would be considered superfluous.

It is not only the banks and the public departments; one sees this duplication, this redundancy of effort, as a feature of the national life.

Purchasing a Stamp.

Have you ever tried to buy a postage stamp at a French postoffice, to have a parcel weighed, to have a letter registered? Across the counter there are twenty employes. There are no fewer than eight windows, only three open for business, and in front of these stand patient queues of from twelve to twenty persons. Closed portfolios of stamps are deliberately withdrawn from shelves and manipulated delicately as if containing rare philatelic treasures. Heaps of printed forms are dealt out and afterward checked sedulously, as though for printers' errors. If more than two stamps are purchased recourse is had to a pencil and abstruse ciphering. All stamps are affixed not by the sender but by the clerk.

To cover a bulky package with five-centime stamps affords rare scope to the decorative faculties. If any additional postal information is required, a second official hovering in the background is called in and consults charts and bulletins—no matter how elementary the question is or that it is asked and answered at least a hundred times a day. All this takes time which elsewhere is precious, but which in France—and, it must be said, in some other Continental countries as well—seems of little consequence.

It is useless to protest. If these clerks are hurried, they seem to go to pieces altogether and their places are taken by other clerks, or else the window is temporarily closed and the patient queue betakes itself to another. Meanwhile, what is the rest of the office staff doing? It is difficult to say. Some of them are writing in ledgers or filling in forms; a few are reading; three or four are counting letters and parcels which have previously been counted by others, but must be checked and rechecked to obtain absolute precision.

It is the same with the telegraphs and telephones—always the waiting file, the same delay and deliberation, as if the whole enterprise were in the experimental stage and the full flavor of novelty were being savored by the jaded staff.

Excessive Inspection.

And what is true of the postoffice is equally true of other Government departments, whether visible to or in direct contact with the public or not. In every branch a stranger cannot avoid noting this addiction to unnecessary routine, this lamentable waste of human material. On the State railways it is notorious, but perhaps not more apparent than in the others, especially the Paris underground system, where the excessive amount of controle and surveillance makes the life of the traveler a burden. It is not the checking but the constant counter-checking, super-checking, over-checking that seems so fantastic.

"We are obliged to take these precautions," one official confided to me.

He pointed out that without this system of surveillance 700 inspectors would be out of a job, which was undeniably true.

No wonder that E. V. Lucas, in a very human passage, complains of the formalities attending the simple pawning of a watch in Paris. In England or America five minutes generally suffices to obtain a loan from a pawnbroker. But in France, "l'oncle—c'est moi," says the State. Consequently there are all sorts of ceremonies and complications, including the examination of passports and the signing in duplicate of declarations and receipts.

Pawning Is Long Operation.

The whole process of obtaining a paltry 50 francs for a watch or a piece of jewelry worth $50 will rarely occupy less than a solid hour. I have heard a hapless Russian noblewoman complain of an ordeal, enduring for over two hours to get a trifling loan on a diamond engagement ring, to say nothing of the humiliation of being herded in with twoscore rather rough-and-ready regular patrons of the official monte-de-piété. And, remember, the same business must again be undergone when the time comes to redeem the pledge. The number of clerks and the quantity of paper used are certainly impressive.

The French customs, the local bureaux d'octroi and the collection of taxes are far more overstaffed than the banks. They absorb tens of thousands of able-bodied men who might be employed in production. These and others form the great French bureaucracy to which so large a part of the French population belongs. Everywhere one is met with a surplus of personnel and formalities and a sluggishness and complication of effort. The police with their licenses, permits and cartes d'identité, the transfer of the applicant from petty official to petty official, must be experienced to be believed.

Red Tape in the Theatre.

But, after all, could a more familiar and amusing illustration of the system be furnished than by a French theatre? The theatregoer who fancies he can step up to a theatre ticket office, ask for a seat, plank down its price and march straightway into the theatre will soon find out his mistake.

To begin with, the very nature of his demand appears to occasion surprise. An orchestra stall? The three officials, a lady and two gentlemen, inside the bureau exchange glances. When they convince themselves this stranger is in earnest, a colored plan of the auditorium is consulted and punctiliously compared with another, marked with various crosses and alphabetical symbols. After a time it is announced that there are two seats in the first balcony at the same price as orchestra stalls—would these suit Monsieur? At 26 francs 50 centimes there are also two places in a rear loge.

You glance at the plan and this time firmly indicate two aisle seats in the orchestra. The very audacity of your manoeuvre causes further glances to be exchanged. One of the trio shakes his head dubiously; his fellow, however, seems to think the idea might be entertained. The lady awaits the issue of the dispute. The upshot is you are offered two seats in the middle of a back row. Should you still persist—and there are other patrons grumbling behind you—there may come a grudging surrender, the chief objector raising his hands as if he washed them of all responsibility; the vouchers are detached and placed before you.

Payment is now in order. This ought to be a summary business. Twice 26 francs 50 centimes yields 53 francs. But arithmetic is notoriously a tricky science. The French vender is taking no risks. A few pencil marks on a pad of paper and the sum in addition is effected. You pass a one hundred-franc note through the wicket. There is a fumbling in drawers. Has Monsieur got 3 francs? No, Monsieur hasn't 3 francs. There is a further pause to regulate the deficit and to count and recount the ten and five-franc notes given in change.

The Next Step.

Eventually this ordeal is triumphantly surmounted and, armed with the vouchers, you proceed to the parquet de contrôle. Here three gentlemen in evening dress are installed on high, like Judges; their duty is to check the preliminary proceedings of the trio in the ticket office. One of them represents the State, one the management of the theatre, and one the management of the company. You gaze on the solemn countenances of these Judges as you proceed to offer your written defense in the shape of the two red, green or yellow vouchers.

A single glance shows that you must expect no mercy if all is not in order. You have embarked on a desperate adventure and must take the consequences. Involuntarily you forage in your pocket, anticipating a demand for your passport, your carte d'identité or other papers. But they are not asked for; the book is consulted; apparently the result is satisfactory. Your vouchers are duly stamped and initialed and you pass into the auditorium.

But your respite is brief; further progress is obstructed by six or eight women, all attired in rusty, funereal black, with caps, aprons and bunches of keys. They scowl at you; one of them relieves you of your hat and overcoat (which you had intended to retain), and another asks to see your tickets. You are told to remain where you are until the return of one of the squad, who has apparently gone on a long journey. When you are ultimately installed it is a fair chance that the aged usher has put you in the wrong seat, having, as she volubly explains, mistaken a B for a P or an I for a J; and, although there are several empty rows in the stalls (which continue to remain empty all the evening), you are forthwith dragged out of your seat and the eight irreparably to blunder about the excess of your imposition. You are lucky if you are not called for an extra tip.

One man in France is said to have viewed the system with impatience and to have expressed his desire to reform it. That man is M. Caillaux, the former Minister of Finance. When he was preparing his budget he was very outspoken about certain departmental estimates and proposed applying the guillotine of retrenchment. But the Minister was quickly reminded that to curtail staffs would only precipitate unemployment and the introduction of State aid to the unemployed, as in England. Nothing would be gained—except a bad advertisement of France's economic weakness.

Wages for Unemployed.

And this brings us to the point of the whole business. Great Britain with her million or more registered unemployed, and France with her 1,000,000—some observers say 2,000,000—unregistered unemployed are on a similar footing. In the one case the State awards a "dole" or unemployment grant to those who do nothing. In the other the State and industry give wages to those who, in a strictly economic sense, might as well be doing nothing. Morally, the advantage is perhaps with France, because the unemployed can keep up their self-respect and the illusion of fulfilling a useful function in the world. Every street in Paris and the large towns has its utterly superfluous notion shops, groceries, butcher shops and milk shops, its petty merchants and dealers, its idle concierges, all battening on the community. Every shop, every office, every industry is overstaffed; but all are drawing pay; all consider themselves self-supporting and indispensable. It is only when they fling down the gauntlet of battle to economic law and the spirit of efficiency—as they occasionally are so ill-advised to do—that their true weakness is revealed.

The Cure for the Evil.

How to cure the evil? By making the new generation true workers instead of drones. By reaping the harvest which the world's inventors have sown; by enterprise, by bringing into existence, as such men as André Citröen have done, new industries of production which will absorb tens of thousands of real workers.

For the roots of the evil, both in France and England, lie in the educational system, which turns out its generations of pupils lacking craftsmanship. If they were wrecked, like Robinson Crusoe, on a desert island, how many of them could fashion a pot or a chair, or weave a yard of cloth, to say nothing of building a house or boat or planting a garden?

It is far easier for such to be a clerk or a petty shopkeeper or a bureaucrat, and go through life intensely busy over trifling tasks that add not a single centime to the real wealth of the nation.

NEW IDEAS FOR RUSSIANS

Nobody Knows What the Peasant Will Do With Them—Wants Government to Leave Him Alone

By ALEXANDER I. NAZAROFF.

THIRTEEN Russian conspirators, who were executed not long ago in Leningrad for anti-Soviet activities, are reported to have asserted in the tribunal that the approach of Grand Duke Nicholas Nicholaievitch with a "White Army" to the Russian frontier would start a peasant rebellion against the Government. These thirteen men risked and lost their lives on the hope that the Russian peasant was ready to rise against the Soviets.

The Russian peasant has always been the hook on which men of dissimilar politics hang their political aspirations. Talk with a Russian Communist and he will tell you probably that the peasant worships the memory of Lenin, that he is ready to die in behalf of the electrification of the country and that his fondest pastime is to vote "proletarian protests" against a speech by Sir Austen Chamberlain or some other "mercenary" of international capital. Question a moderate Socialist and he will assure you that the Russian peasant rises every morning with the name of Kerensky on his lips. As to a monarchist, well, men are fond of incarnating their own wishes and ideas in those whom they describe.

Aside from statements of opinion, Soviet writers, and especially provincial correspondents of Soviet periodicals, quote facts. These facts are significant. It would be vain to deny that much that is new is breaking in upon the habit and thought of the Russian peasant. Even the peasant costume is undergoing changes. Village beauties have learned to use umbrellas and rubbers; a few have given up kerchiefs for hats; face powder is displacing flour, and the lipstick has made its appearance. Once in a while a man may be seen wearing a straw hat. That fact is momentous. New styles are exceptional, but are they not the forerunners of the establishment of department stores?

The Church and the Club.

The new is to be observed not only in the costume. Take the Church. On the whole it is still strong and popular with peasants. Yet there are villages where, under the influence of local Communists, parishioners together with the priest have dismissed Princes of the blood from the lists of Russian saints. There are villages in which churches have been torn down or closed. But as a rule the Church survives.

In larger villages one may see a club bearing the sign: "Peasant Club and Reading Room," or "The Union of Communist Youths." Such institutions are likely to mount over the entrance a plaster bust of Lenin with no nose, an ear, or a cheek washed away by rain. Once in a while a doctor or teacher from a near-by city delivers a lecture in the club. Usually peasants listen in silence and with respect, as they listened in former days to an official coming to announce a new law. But at times the lecturers are heckled by the crowd: "Are you sent here to replace God? Why don't you, then, give us rain and save us from the drought?"

Unexpected types of peasant Communists are developing. The correspondent of a Moscow paper relates that in a peasant cabin in a village of central Russia he glanced at the wall and found to his surprise that it was adorned with pictures of the Czar and Czarina, beneath which hung portraits of the leaders of the Communist revolution. The correspondent learned that his impartial host was the leading Communist in the village. If such contrasting politics can peacefully occupy the mind of a "conscious comrade," what strange political cocktails are being shaken in the minds of less distinguished Ivans?

Conflict Between Generations.

The younger generation quickly imbibes influences emanating from the city. Misunderstandings between fathers and sons make themselves felt with especial keenness in the village today. In some localities where peasant youths are organized into "Comsomol" (Union of Young Communists), blasphemous songs, occasional breakings of windows in the priest's house, and other escapades usually arouse the fathers and collisions follow. The result is sometimes not only bleeding noses, but also broken bones and even death.

Generally, the feud between parent and child is less tragical. There is the instance of the girl Nastasya, who has become a member of the union. After a quarrel with her father she went to seek protection of the near-by Soviet Court. She accused her father of "impeding her free Communist development." The Court ordered the father to leave his house, taking with him a horse, a plow and a few other things; the way was thus rendered safe for Nastasya's free Communist development.

What do the parents think? What do they long for? A Moscow journalist answers. "It seems sometimes that the only thing they long for is samogon (the home-distilled vodka) and as much of it as possible." Everybody drinks and always has. They drank during the Soviet's prohibition experiment. The State-produced vodka has to compete with the illegal samogon, which is cheaper and stronger.

Drink Habit Unchanged.

"Peasants of such and such village have sold so many community cows and spent the money for drink"—dispatches like this are frequent in the provincial press. There are places where an agricultural laborer can be hired with samogon only for wages. And while prohibition was in force even Soviet institutions were obliged to submit to this custom, paying their laborers in the coveted liquor. Indeed, the sovereign will of the Russian peasant is unfathomable on almost all questions except drink. On that it is quite clear.

In other respects Russia's countryside is in transition. The old peasant Russia, "the Russia of long standing services, pious prostrations and severe fasts," is alive, but its foundations are shaken. The "new" is seeping in through the cracks. And this new or even ultra new combines with the old in a most incoherent and irrelevant salade Russe. Beside the village Communist lives the village wizard or fortune teller.

For with the loss of authority by the priest and the suppression of religious education this hero of the heathen days has reappeared; of this Soviet writers often complain. The village Communist and the village wizard may be combined in one person; such cases are recorded.

Do Russian peasants like the Soviet Government? The answer is, the less they see of it, the better they like it. "Let us alone"—such long has been their attitude not only toward the Soviet Government but toward any Government; "let us alone and allow us to work and reap the fruit of our work." In 1919-1921, when the burden of taxations and requisitions was too heavy, they protested. Now, as the economic situation has improved, there are no more uprisings. It is only once now and then that they slay a "Sielkor"—a village reporter—or an official who gives information to the tax collector.

Régimes in Moscow may come and go, but as long as the change does not directly affect the peasant he will remain indifferent. He is assimilating new ideas and new slogans that have been presented to him. What will he say about them years hence? Nobody knows. Passivity has always characterized him.

LACK OF SKILLED LABOR.

BRITISH unemployed are unskilled, while skilled workmen are difficult to obtain. At the Royal Institute of British Architects it was recently said that there were in England in 1924 25,000 fewer skilled workmen than in 1921, these including carpenters, bricklayers, masons, slaters, plasterers, painters and plumbers. In 1914 a rod of brickwork in London cost about half as much as in 1925, the material having risen in price two fold and labor more than that. Yet master builders had only about half as many apprentices as were necessary to carry on the essential work of the country.

STORIED ORPHAN HOME TO MOVE FROM LONDON

Foundling Hospital a Gift of the Massachusetts Colonist, Coram, Who Made Himself Poor to Rescue Waifs—Aided by Hogarth and Handel

By LEONARD B. HOLME.

LONDON.

LONDON'S famous old Foundling Hospital, now moving into new and better quarters in the country, will leave a gap in Bloomsbury that no scientific city-planning or group of modern office buildings can adequately fill. It is typical bit of the homely old town that Dickens loved, and speaks eloquently of the life and struggles of an older generation, yet—though few remember this—it owes its origin to the inspiration and persistence of an American. At any rate, he was one who had spent his best years in the old Colony of Massachusetts Bay, and kept memories of its free forests and boundless liberty when he returned to the dirty, squalid streets of eighteenth-century London.

Today no one thinks of him. People associate the Foundling Hospital chiefly with the beautiful singing of children and the influence it had. How an orphan asylum, through the chance friendships of its founder, became one of the main centres of church music in England is a curious story. The effect has been that for generations the old-fashioned chapel in Lamb's Conduit Street has attracted from all parts of London people eager to hear the children sing.

The services are unique in setting and music. On either side of the organ, on which Handel himself once played, high in the western gallery sit the children, 300 of them. The girls are clad in blue frocks, white aprons and mob caps; the boys wear suits with short chocolate-colored brass-buttoned jackets and scarlet waistcoats. They face the altar, with its lovely picture by Sir Benjamin West of "Christ Presenting a Child," and the simple white font at which they and 30,000 other children have received the rite of baptism.

Coram a Massachusetts Colonist.

As the chaplain ascends the lofty reading desk and calls for prayer, every girl by custom throws her apron over her head and every lad bows until nothing but rows of white collars gleam through the dusk along their benches. Then comes the service with a choir of 100 children, chanting against the deep notes of a few male choristers. Half a dozen girls will sing alone in perfect time and tune some composition from one of the great English composers of church music, or the sweet notes of a boy will rise clear in a solo.

These ceremonials are reminders of the resolute charity of Thomas Coram. Aided by his wife, Eunice, he agitated for years to fix public attention upon one of the blots on London life in the eighteenth century. In the end, by force of his own personality, he stirred the conscience of the leaders of the social and artistic circles of his time. He had had few cultural advantages. He was the son of a ship captain, was born at Lyme Regis in Dorsetshire about 1668 and in his twenties crossed the ocean to New England.

In 1694 he settled at Taunton in Massachusetts and a few years later established himself as a shipwright in Boston. But Taunton, a settlement inland from Plymouth, held his interest and there on Dec. 8, 1703, he executed a deed giving a grant of fifty-nine acres of land for the erection of a schoolhouse, to be effective whenever the people of Taunton—then still influenced by Plymouth—should desire to establish a church of the Church of England. He presented books to the library, and in 1844 there was and perhaps there still is preserved there a copy of the Book of Common Prayer given to Coram by the famous Speaker Onslow of the English House of Commons. In 1704 he was interesting himself in one of the earliest examples of "imperial preference"—an act to grant a bounty on the tar that was imported from the Colonies to England. In 1720 he returned home to settle in London.

Walpole's Impression of Him.

Coram kept up his attachment to America. In 1730 he was appointed one of the first trustees of Georgia, and in 1735 was an active supporter of a scheme for the settlement of unemployed artisans in Nova Scotia. A little later he advocated a change in the Colonial regulations for the advancement of English hatters, and for this work would accept from the trade no other reward than a hat!

Horace Walpole, recording his impression of Thomas Coram, has left a clean-cut picture of him. He was, he said, "the honestest, most disinterested, most knowing person about the plantations" in America he had ever talked with. It fits in neatly with all that is known of the solid citizen of 52 or 53 who had left his active useful life in New England to return to London, hoping, no doubt, to spend the rest of his days in greater comfort than the Colonies could provide.

But it was not long before Coram discovered that London, though the car of the United Kingdom, had a seamy side. There are wretched stretches of slums now, but they give hardly the faintest idea of the squalor and vice prevalent in the great city at the beginning of the eighteenth century. London was at a critical stage of its development. The old restraints disappeared as wealth and prosperity increased, and the wretched inhabitants who had failed to progress were huddled together in vile quarters where every sort of vice and misery flourished. The life depicted in Gay's "Beggar's Opera," the scenes drawn by Hogarth in his "Gin Lane," were horrible realities. Coram must have witnessed them as he walked abroad.

To come to such a town straight from the God-fearing folk and the pure healthy spaces of New England must have given a shock to Coram. Particularly was he horrified by one street sight, that of new-born infants lying exposed and starving. When he expressed indignation, a shrug of the shoulders was the reply he got. Another girl had deserted her baby—that was all.

Coram was roused; his righteous wrath burns still through the formal words of the petition he presented for the charter of the hospital he had determined to establish for these little waifs. This hospital was, he said, "To prevent the frequent murders of poor, miserable children at their birth and to suppress the inhuman custom of exposing new-born infants to perish in the streets."

He was angry, but it took him seventeen years to achieve his purpose—a fact which seems to throw almost as damning a light on the state of society at that time as the actual fact of the abandonment of these children—and it was not till 1739 that he could arouse enough interest to hold a public meeting. It appeared that if he wanted the hospital to be built he must undertake the chief financial burden himself.

Impoverished Himself.

The Foundling Hospital had its first home in Hatton Garden, but in a few months Coram entered into an agreement with the Earl of Salisbury of that period to purchase fifty-six acres in Lamb's Conduit Fields, not far to the north of Gray's Inn. It was in the open country then. Coram had no desire to buy as much as fifty-six acres and was expecting to pay no more than £5,000. Lord Salisbury insisted that he must take over the whole estate and demanded £7,000, but compromised at £6,500, the Earl undertaking to present £500 as a contribution to the hospital from himself.

The hospital for nearly two centuries has been drawing a large income from the rental of the land it did not directly use, as it has now sold the entire property for £1,650,000.

Theodore Jacobsen, architect of the hospital, made it a plain brick structure with stone trimmings in classical style. The west wing was finished in December, 1746. Coram lived until March 29, 1751, but had become impoverished, having given all he possessed to the hospital. After his wife died he found it necessary to make an appeal to his friends for aid, explaining that as he had never wasted his money in self-indulgence, he was not ashamed to admit that he was poor.

Hospital Too Successful.

On March 20, 1749, it was arranged that an annuity of £161 should be paid to him, partly as the result of a public subscription, partly from his own hospital's funds. It was recorded as an unusual fact, proving the high esteem in which Coram was held, that Frederic, Prince of Wales, not only promised a contribution of £25, but paid it regularly.

The Foundling Hospital's object was solely to save the lives of illegitimate children. Nineteen boys and eleven girls were the inmates of its first home. To rescue others it was thought that means should be provided whereby mothers could bring their infants as easily and secretly as possible. For that purpose a basket was hung outside the door. The mother was expected to slip up after dark, deposit her baby, ring the bell and depart.

The plan was too successful. Not only London waifs were left in the basket, but waifs from all over the country. Local authorities from quite distant parts, faced with the cost of supporting for years the unwanted infants of their own parishes, decided to send them to this extraordinary new institution in London. By degrees a regular business in transporting them grew up.

Hogarth Assists.

Only the roughest persons would embark in such a business, and they did not care whether the babies survived the journey or not. Out of the 15,000 infants brought to the hospital in less than four years only 4,400 withstood the treatment they had received before admission and lived long enough to be apprenticed.

Every child was at once christened. The first boy and girl were called Thomas and Eunice Coram, and to this day there is always one Thomas and one Eunice Coram in the hospital, to perpetuate the names of the generous founders. It became the fashion for personages of high degree to stand sponsor for some of the foundlings. It was decided that robust boys must go to sea; so they were christened Drake, Norris or Blake, after famous Admirals in the English Navy.

Hogarth, the cartoonist, living half a mile away, at the sign of the Golden Head in Leicester Square, was a frequent visitor. He painted the portrait of Coram, which is now in the hospital, and presented to it his "The March of the Guards to Finchley" and "Moses Brought to Pharaoh's Daughter." Other famous artists followed his example, and among the pictures in the board room today are J. C. Copley's "Siege of Gibraltar," Raphael's "Murder of the Innocents," Reynolds's "Earl of Dartmouth" and Gainsborough's picture of "The Charterhouse."

Handel Gave the Organ.

At a later period two admirable prints of special interest to Americans were given to the hospital—a portrait of Benjamin Franklin and one of George Washington that was engraved when he was President of the United States by order of the governors of the "University of Cambridge, Massachusetts," in 1793.

The art collection at the foundling, in fact, became famous and its parlors were for a time the fashionable lounge. From the interest taken in pictures the idea of holding a public exhibition was conceived by the Royal Academy, and its annual shows are the direct result of the gifts made by Hogarth to the hospital in its early days. Coram enlisted the aid of Handel, who gave the hospital an organ and often played it. He gave several performances of his "Messiah" in the chapel, with the children, as they grew big enough, as his chorus, and he left the manuscript of the "Messiah" to the hospital.

JAPANESE AMASSED $15,000,000 GROWING CALIFORNIA POTATOES

TWENTY-SIX years ago a Japanese farmer, having studied scientific agriculture in the schools of his native land, came to the United States because he believed that he would have greater opportunity to put into practice his newly acquired ideas of large-scale farming. He settled in the delta farm land area near Stockton, Cal., and engaged in the growing of potatoes.

Ten years later George Shima was known as the "potato king of California," and when he died a few days ago in Hollywood his fortune was estimated at $15,000,000. His death came on the eve of his intended departure for his native land with his wife, a visit which was to mark Mrs. Shima's first return to Japan since she left there as a bride.

Shima was 35 years old when he left Tokio in 1900 for San Francisco. He was quick to see the possibilities of developing the delta lands near Stockton. He began by leasing small plots of ground for potato planting, adding to his holdings as he prospered. Long-established delta farmers were soon following his example and planting potatoes. One year, after a devastating frost had wiped out the entire potato crop of the delta region, including Shima's the Japanese farmer immediately planted another crop and was able to harvest it late in the season at high prices.

So swift was Shima's success that within ten years after his arrival in this country he virtually controlled California's potato crop. He always disclaimed any intention of cornering the market, asserting that any monopolistic appearances were due entirely to accident.

Shima retired from active farming in 1917 and devoted himself to the marketing end of his business. At the time of his retirement he had subleased his 25,000 owned or controlled acres to other Japanese farmers. Besides his wife, Shima is survived by two sons, one a student at Stanford University, the other a student at Berkeley High School, and a daughter.

GIANTS TRIUMPHANT MID WINTRY BLASTS

10,000 Defy Chilly Day to See Them Turn Back Braves by 4 to 2.

TYSON'S DOUBLE SCORES 2

Blow in Sixth Brings In Runs That Win — McQuillan Outpitches Joe Genewich.

WIND MAKES FLIES CAREEN

McGrawmen Get Early Start, but Boston Ties Them in Fourth—Kelly Misses a Homer.

By HARRY CROSS.

The Giants outweathered the Braves up at the Polo Grounds by a score of 4 to 2 simply because they come of a hardy race and stood the frigid weather and the wintry blasts better than the Bostonese. Hughey McQuillan outpitched Boston's most accomplished tosser, Joe Genewich, and after the fifth inning sent the Braves back to the bench without a hit.

As many as 10,000 spectators got out their Winter furs and mufflers and laughed at the busy little tonsilitis germs which buzzed around the stands. Cold? Say, the only thing missing to make it a perfect Arctic setting was the aurora borealis.

A high wind made the fly balls do tricks and the outfielders, especially Al Tyson, had some trouble finding out just what said flies were going to do. Winter baseball is getting a fair trial here but it is doubtful if it will take. It was a fine day for ski jumping.

Mr. Tyson, the new centre fielder, had quite a day for himself. He did a lot of things. His most impressive gesture was a two-base hit in the sixth inning with the bases filled which packed over two full-sized runs, broke the deadlock and won the game for the Giants.

In the fourth, however, Tyson, who had singled to short, was followed by Jackson, who hit a fly ball to Jimmy Welsh in right field. Al went on down to second and stood there while Welsh made the catch and doubled him at first base. The only explanation for this is that Tyson was frozen to the spot. It was plenty cold enough.

Giants Score at Outset.

The Giants scored in the first, long before they had been thawed out. After Lindstrom succumbed at first, Frisch walked and stole second without losing a bit of time. Young skied to Brown, and Meusel ripped a double to left which influenced Frisch over the plate.

In the second inning, with two out, Jimmy Johnston crashed a hit against the right-field wall, assuming that it was a double. It might have been if Ross Young's arm hadn't been in the neighborhood. Jimmy was sadly mistaken. It was a single he got and not a double, for Young chucked him out as he dove into the bag and ran bang into the waiting Frisch.

The Giants stimulated their circulations in the third. With two out, Frisch shot a double to left, Frank Wilson being badly fooled on the ball. Young's single to centre sent Frankie home.

The Braves warmed up sufficiently to tie the score in the fourth. Frank Wilson graciously received a pass from McQuillan, and Welsh hoisted to Tyson. Brown cracked a single to centre, the wind making it difficult for Tyson to handle it. Wilson tried to score from first, but was nailed at the plate, Brown going to second.

The Braves Tie the Count.

Burrus singled to left, scoring Brown, and Jimmy Johnston's double to left sent Burrus to third and he scored on an infield single which bounced off McQuillan's glove. Johnston was nipped between third and home on an attempted double steal.

The Giants got near to normal temperature by doing a lot of running and brisk walking in the sixth. Frisch started with a double and Pep Young hit the ball at his feet and thought it was a foul. Taylor tossed the ball to second to try to get Frisch off the sack, but didn't. Gautreau threw to first and got Young. Pep didn't take the trouble to run. Meusel singled and Frisch went to third. Irish stole second and Kelly walked to crowd the corners.

Al Tyson tore a double to centre and Frisch and Meusel romped across the platter Jackson walked and filled the bases again, but Hartley filed to Banny and McQuillan struck out for the third time.

Kelly Misses Getting Homer.

George Kelly unburdened himself of a tremendous bang in the eighth. He hit the ball high over Brown's head in centre and it rolled to the centre field exit. Kelly could have turned it into a homer, but he stopped on the way and went back to third for some unknown reason. George was marooned at third, for Tyson went out at first. Jackson walked and Hartley rolled into a double play.

When they named the home of the Giants the Polo Grounds they made a typographical error. It should have been Polar Grounds.

Freddy Lindstrom still has a black eye from his collision with a baseball last week, but he can see well enough to get the ball to first on a straight line.

Hughey McQuillan not only carried off the pitching honors for himself but he also had something to do with the best pitching which Genewich

YANKS TURN LOOSE BATS ON SENATORS

Homers by Gehrig and Collins in a Grand Total of 15 Hits Smother Champions, 8-6.

JONES ENCOUNTERS TROUBLE

Loses 4-Run Lead in First, but Hoyt Holds Foe to 3 Safeties in Next Eight Frames.

By JAMES R. HARRISON.

Special to The New York Times.

WASHINGTON, D. C., April 17.—Murderers' row broke out into homicidal activities again this afternoon and in the midst of the admirable carnage the champion Senators went down with a sickening thud before 15,000 admiring fans.

Those who had come to witness a decent burial for the Yankees remained to lay a lily on the breast of the recumbent champions and then tiptoe silently toward the exits. The score was 8 to 6, and at that the Senators were lucky.

Hammer blows delivered by Babe Ruth, Henry Louis Gehrig, Pat Collins, Earl Combs and others of the Huggins homiciders drove Alex Ferguson from the mound at the end of two innings and left Curly Ogden in such condition that even his best friends failed to recognize him.

Gehrig slapped a home run over the right-field fence in the first inning with two on and nobody out, giving the Yanks an immediate edge. In the second inning Collins patted a homer into the left-field bleachers and Combs negotiated a triple to centre.

Booming of Hits Continues.

Getting warmed up after this fine beginning, the Yanks went on to bigger and better things. The total statistics show fifteen hits for the New Yorkers, of which two were homers, three triples, two doubles and the rest mere singles. Collins cut himself off a homer and a double, Gehrig a homer, triple and single, Ruth a triple and single, Combs a triple and two singles and Joe Dugan a double and single.

Mark Koenig brought disgrace on his fair name by getting only two singles. Tony Lazzeri went hitless and will be released before sunrise.

At that it was no triumphal procession for the Yanks. They handed Sam Jones a four-run lead in the first inning and Sam squandered it scandalously, retiring with nobody out, one on base, four runs in and Sam Jones out.

Waite Hoyt stopped the rally and allowed the Senators only three hits in the next eight innings. The champs took the lead in the third, but the Yanks came even in the fifth and won in the seventh on triples by Ruth and Gehrig and a sacrifice fly.

Yanks Get Flying Start.

Gehrig's homer, preceded by Combs's single and Koenig's hit by pitcher gave the Yanks three runs before anybody was out. Ruth boomed a long foul into the stand, then fouled to Ruel. Meusel chopped a single to Myer and scored from first on Dugan's double to right with the hit and run on.

The Senatorial insurrection in the same inning started when Jones hit Rice on the shoulder. Harris doubled and Goslin walked, filling the pathways. Joe Harris's two-bagger to right cleared them up and Judge's single sent in Joe and tied the score. Hoyt, called into consultation at this moment, fanned Bluege and Judge was doubled up trying to steal, smothering the rally.

Waite lived to regret his harsh treatment of Mr. Bluege. After S. Harris and Judge had walked in the third with two out, the Washington third baseman punched a triple over Combs's head and sent the Senators a run to the good.

Collins's homer in the second had made the New York total five, and the Hugmen tied the score in the fifth on successive singles by Combs, Gehrig and Ruth.

Gehrig and Ruth Triple.

Murderers' row became busy again in the seventh and stabbed the champions for two more runs. Gehrig whaled a triple to left centre and Ruth did like-

PHILS MAKE MERRY OVER ROBIN ANTICS

Amass 15-3 Victory While Brooklyn Boots Ball Around and Muffs Pop Flies.

MANY ERRORS NOT LISTED

Robbie Again Holds Parade of Pitchers With McWeeny, Stryker, Boehler and Moss in Line.

By RICHARDS VIDMER.

Special to The New York Times.

PHILADELPHIA, April 17.—The Robins did about everything to a ball game that can be done today and the Phillies did the same thing to a string of Brooklyn pitchers. The Flatbushers flung away chances to score, tossed the ball hither and yon, misjudged pop flies and finally collapsed. The Phillies waited and walked and slugged and scored. It was terrible, and the cold wind that swept the park didn't make it any better.

When the dead and wounded, or both, were totaled the vital statistics were 15 to 3. Those figures were found only after a corps of public accountants had been called into consultation.

Most of the Phillies' runs were presented to them, as a matter of fact. But they could have thrown out all those that weren't actually driven in and still won by a comfortable margin.

All of Errors Not Recorded.

The worst of it is that all the Robins' errors don't show in the box score. Twice high flies fell safe within a foot or two of the pitcher's box and two other pop flies that landed around Snooks Dowd's territory went for hits. It was an ill wind indeed that swept over the diamond, but the Phillies seemed to know it well enough to call it by its name. They weren't misjudging anything within reach.

It was a maudlin exhibition from any standpoint, but it has been many a year since the fans of Philadelphia have had the opportunity to see such a massacre committed by the Phillies, and 12,000 of them gloried in the slaughter, though they were threatened with pneumonia. And they call this the City of Brotherly Love.

The famous gang which paraded wherever Brooklyn played last year has been dispersed, but the foundation of a bigger and better crew was nominated. First there was Doug. McWeeny, better known as the Buzzer. He lasted five innings and it must be admitted that it still was a ball game up to that time. After Buzz was removed for a pinch hitter with the score 5 to 3, it became a burlesque, and it grew more and more ludicrous as Sterling Stryker, George Boehler and Ray Moss passed morosely but manfully in review.

Four Hits Greet Stryker.

Stryker was greeted with four solid slaps by the first four men who faced him and then turned on the hot water. Boehler finished the sixth and seventh innings, but only by the grace of Robbie's curiosity.

Evidently the round Uncle wanted to see how wide, high and handsome George could throw, and he saw plenty in all directions. George walked four and let loose a wild pitch.

Moss pitched the eighth and did the seemingly impossible by getting the Phillies out with only one run scored against him.

Anyway the Robins weren't as bad as they were in the series with the Yankees. They were worse.

The Phillies aren't capitalizing their natural resources. They have the highest right-field fence in the United States and Canada, and there isn't an advertisement on it. Spectators have to watch the ball game whether they like it or not.

The Robins sang one of their famous lost chords in the second inning when they crowded the bases with none out and failed to score. O'Neil popped to Bentley, McWeeny fanned and Dowd rolled weakly to the box.

The Robins couldn't get one run across on three hits in the third, and the Phillies made three on two hits in the same inning. Not any of them

Mitchell Beats Ray on Latter's Links, 7-5, And Takes £100 From Loser's Club Members

OXHEY, England, April 17 (AP).—Following the drubbing which he administered to George Duncan yesterday, Abe Mitchell gave additional proof of his 1926 golfing prowess today by beating the veteran Ted Ray, 7 and 5.

The match was played on Ray's own course here and was over thirty-six holes for a prize of £100. The Oxhey Club members raised the purse to back their judgment that Ray was unbeatable on his own grounds.

At the end of the morning round Mitchell was 6 up, achieving what probably no other golfer has done in winning eight out of eleven holes against a player of Ray's calibre. Mitchell took 70 for the morning round, against Ray's 75.

COLUMBIA BUNCHES HITS TO BEAT PENN

Groups Eight of Twelve Safeties in Three Scoring Innings and Wins, 8 to 5.

SOLVES LONG IN THE SIXTH

Drives Captain From Mound and Finds Kreuz Even Easier—Cole's Homer Scores Three.

Special to The New York Times.

PHILADELPHIA, April 17.—Crashing out base hits when hits meant runs, the Columbia baseball team this afternoon opened the quadrangular cup competition with an 8-to-5 triumph over Penn on Franklin Field.

Columbia's fielding was above reproach and the batting was of sufficient power to account for twelve hits. The Morningside collegians bunched eight of their safeties over three scoring innings. The twelve hits were divided equally among six men, while each of Pennsylvania's ten blows went to a different batsman.

Captain Long started on the hill for the Red and Blue, but gave way to Kreuz in the sixth inning after three runs had been made off him. Kreuz was hit more freely than Long, seven of the winners' safeties coming off his delivery. Art Smith went the limit for Columbia and had only one bad inning, the sixth, when Penn counted three of its markers. Pete Cole, the Red and Blue shortstop, was responsible for these markers, driving out the first home run of the season with two on base.

The box score:

WEST POINT, N. Y., April 17.—Army's lacrosse twelve won from Swarthmore today in a close and hard-fought contest, 2 to 1. The cadets scored early, and it was well they did, for the little Quakers after the first ten minutes of play put up a powerful defensive game and kept the Army men off while they themselves scored a goal.

FORDHAM SMOTHERS YALE NINE, 15 TO 5

Dwyer Checks Losers' Rallies and Ellis Bow Before 400 in a Cold Windstorm.

SHOOP AND SMITH WILD

Issue Sixteen Passes, Hit a Batter and Make a Balk—Noble Gets Homer.

Special to The New York Times.

NEW HAVEN, Conn., April 17.—Fordham took advantage of Yale's glaring battery weakness this afternoon and inflicted a 15-to-5 defeat upon the Elis before a shivering crowd of 400.

Fordham's fielding was steady, Woerner and White figuring in a brilliant succession of chances, two of which snuffed out Yale rallies by the double play route. Although Yale gave sixteen free passes to Fordham, with Shoop and Smith in the box, the airtight Fordham fielding and timely clouting would have outscored the Yale total.

Graham and Carter led in effective batting, each pounding four runs across the plate. The all-around exhibition of Woerner, which included two sacrifice hits, three runs and nine errorless chances, was the climax of the scintillating Fordham display.

Cold Hampers the Pitchers.

Pitching control was impossible in the teeth of the small gale and the freezing temperature which prevailed. The teams considered calling off the game because of cold weather, but decided to play it because of the crowd, which clamored to witness the meeting of the teams, which has proved an annual feature of the Yale season for a decade.

Pitcher Dwyer, although pummeled lustily by Yale in the first and seventh innings and giving five free passes, was untouchable when hits were needed. The high total of twenty-one bases on balls and one man hit by a pitcher created a new wildness record for Yale field. In addition, Smith, Yale's reserve pitcher, broke loose for two wild pitches, and Shoop, who lasted nearly six innings, made a balk, making a grand total of twenty-five pitching gifts.

Lindley Leads Yale Batters.

Captain Lindley led the Yale attack with two singles in three trips to the plate. Larry Noble's homer in the first into the right-field stands, driving McClellan and Lindley in ahead of him, gave Yale a 3-to-0 lead, which was maintained until the third inning, when White's two-bagger, Landry's pass, Carter's single, Clancy's pass and Graham's two-bagger netted four runs.

RICKARD ANNOUNCES GARDEN FOR CHICAGO

Will Build Arena to Seat 20,000 and Cost Between $5,000,000 and $13,000,000.

TO BE READY BY DEC. 1

Deal for Site in Loop District to Be Closed Soon—His Backers Not Revealed.

CHICAGO, April 17 (AP).—A huge sports arena, seating from 20,000 to 22,000 persons and costing from $5,000,000 to $13,000,000, depending upon the style of structure, will be built in Chicago by Tex Rickard, the New York boxing promoter announced today. It will be called Madison Square Garden and will be similar to Rickard's arena in New York City.

Rickard said the deal for the site, which will be in the downtown Loop district, would be closed within ten days and that work on the structure would begin within two weeks. The building, according to the plans, will be finished Dec. 1. Rickard declined to reveal the names of his backers or the site of the building, but said that several wealthy Chicagoans were financing the enterprise.

In addition to boxing, the building will be used for hockey, six-day bicycle races, conventions, circuses and other affairs. The Illinois boxing law provides that a promoter must be a resident of the State for three years prior to his application for a license, and Rickard was emphatic that he would not promote bouts here himself, but would lease the building to a Chicagoan who could prove himself capable.

Rickard plans to leave for the West tomorrow, presumably to meet Jack Dempsey for a conference over the proposed match with Gene Tunney. Rickard may stage this contest in Jersey City if refused a permit in New York. He says Tunney has signed and that he expects to have no trouble with the heavyweight champion.

NEW YORK IS ASSURED OF ANOTHER PRO SIX

Rangers, Sponsored by Colonel Hammond, Promised Admission —Other Cities Considered.

MONTREAL, Quebec, April 17 (AP).—The National Hockey League at its semi-annual meeting here this afternoon appointed a committee of three to visit Chicago, Detroit, Jersey City and Philadelphia to interview syndicates in these cities which are bidding for franchises in the league.

The committee will leave next week to examine into financial standings of the syndicates and look into the hockey situation in each city. A report will be submitted to a special meeting of the league which will be held next month. The members of the committee are President Frank Calder of the National Hockey League, President James Stachan of the Montreal Maroons and Manager Director Leo Dandurand of the Canadien Hockey Club, Montreal.

The New York Rangers, new professional hockey team sponsored by John S. Hammond, were assured that they would be admitted to the leaguee for next season. Actual admittance rests with the annual meeting next September. The new club will operate in Madison Square Garden.

Hockey games in future will be run along baseball lines, which means that visiting clubs will get a percentage of the money taken in the home arena, it was announced. In the past the home club took all the gate money.

Applications for franchises were tabled from five cities, New York, Detroit, Chicago, Philadelphia and Cleveland. Five separate interests from Detroit were represented respectively by F. R. Bierer, B. C. Whitney, J. J. Miller, B. H. McCreath and Percy Leseur, former Ottawa goal keeper and present manager of the Windsor, Ontario, arena.

LOCKE TIES RECORD IN 100-YARD DASH

Wins Kansas Event in 0:09 6-10 and Helps Nebraska Relay Cut World's ½-Mile Time.

HOFF FAILS TO SET MARK

Norwegian Vaulter Has Trouble With Movie Men and Best Effort Is 13 Feet 4 Inches.

LAWRENCE, Kan., April 17 (AP).—Roland Locke of the University of Nebraska equaled the world's record of 0:09 6-10 for the 100-yard dash at the Kansas relays here this afternoon. The Nebraskan's performance came after he had run a preliminary heat in 0:09 8-10.

Locke found strong competition but breasted the tape more than a yard ahead of Deliz Maria of the University of Notre Dame. Keane of Creighton University finished third and O'Shields of the University of Minnesota fourth.

Coach Fielding H. Yost of Michigan, the referee, said he was certain that Locke's time would stand. The wind was blowing across the stadium from the west, but the stands protected the field, which was quiet.

Illinois Quartet Home Second.

A new world's record was hung up in the university half-mile relay by the University of Nebraska quartet. The time was 1:26 6-10, bettering the former record of 1:27 made by Illinois last year. Locke, after equaling the world's record in the 100-yard dash, ran in the anchor position for Nebraska and scored the victory for his team. Illinois finished second and Kansas third.

In winning the one-mile high school relay, the boys from Devitt High of Washington, D. C., ran the distance in 3:30 3-10, hanging up a new Kansas relay meet record. The team was composed of Palmer, Carney, Clark and Shatter. Central, Kansas City, Mo., finished second and Wichita, Kansas, third.

Charles Hoff of Norway, world's pole vault champion, failed in an attempt to break his outdoor record of 13 feet, 11 13-16 inches. His best effort was 13:4. The bar was raised to 13:9, but the Norwegian star failed to clear it in three trials.

Hoff refused to permit motion picture camera men to record his performance and it was only after officials of the Relays prevailed upon the movie men to take down their machines that he touched his bamboo.

Locke First by Two Yards.

Hein, Dailey, Davenport and Locke composed the record breaking Nebraska relay team. Running in the order named, the Cornhusker sprinters led all the way, the brilliant Locke out-distancing his Illinois opponent by about two yards at the tape. Kansas was a close third. Five meet records also went by the board and one, also an intercollegiate mark, was equaled.

CLUB STEAK FIRST IN $10,000 ABERDEEN

Filly Wins Juvenile Feature of Havre de Grace Meeting by Beating 19 Others.

AT THE POST 14 MINUTES

Starter Has Trouble Getting Field Away—Red Rocket Is Second, A. P. Canale Third.

BEDWELL HAS 3 WINNERS

Saddles Foreland, Senator Norris and Cudgeller—Jockey W. Smith Scores a Double.

Special to The New York Times.

HAVRE DE GRACE, Md., April 17.—Club Steak, brown daughter of Meridian and Stake and Cap, owned and trained by J. P. Jones, this afternoon added her name to an illustrious list of previous winners when she easily won the fourteenth running of the $10,000 added Aberdeen Stakes, the leading juvenile fixture of the meeting. Carrying 113 pounds and with Chalmers in the saddle, the fleet filly outsprinted nineteen rivals and ran the four and one-half furlongs in 0:54 2-5 over a fast track.

Through her decisive victory Club Steak earned $11,050 for her owner-trainer. Club Steak was the heavily played public choice at a little better than even money and paid, $4.30 for each $2 ticket in the mutuels.

With the Aberdeen as the feature of a strong card a great crowd turned out for the half-holiday sport, crowding the stands and seeking every point of vantage for the running of the juvenile stake.

H. G. Bedwell had a successful afternoon, saddling three winners under his own colors. He took the opener with Foreland, the third with Senator Norris and the fifth with Cudgeller. W. Smith took the jockey honors with a double, riding Cudgeller in the fifth and Golden Billows in the sixth.

Twenty Face the Starter.

Only one of the overnight entries declined the issue in the Aberdeen, and twenty of the best colts and fillies that have yet carried colors in the Spring racing faced the barrier. With such a big band of youngsters to handle, Starter James Milton had his troubles, and it took fourteen minutes before he could catch them level to spring the barrier.

Club Steak had drawn the No. 1 post position, and her phenomenal speed stood her in good stead in such a scramble away from the barrier. It was the second time she had carried colors, and it was a repetition in a way of her race of yesterday, when she outclassed a big field of maiden fillies. Jones sent her right back, and it was evident that her maiden effort had not dulled her speed.

Draws Clear Under Pressure.

After they had settled in their strides Chalmers held his mount close to the pace and the field began to string out. In the stretch drive he called upon the filly and she drew clear under pressure. At the end, however, Chalmers was able to take her in hand and she finished going nicely, with a margin of three lengths over the Pastime Stable's colt Red Rocket, a seasoned campaigner and the winner of his last three starts.

Red Rocket was packing top weight of 122 pounds. W. Smith got him away well from an outside post position and on the turn he raced down J. A. Buchanan's filly Dignus, which had made the pace down the backstretch. But Red Rocket weakened in the stretch when Club Steak challenged. He held on gamely, however, to take the place by two lengths from A. P. Canale, the latter leading Dignus past the winning post by half a length. The fractional times of the race were as follows: 0:23, 0:47 2-5, 0:54 2-5.

Muskallonge Is Choice.

The opening number, a dash of six furlongs for three-year-olds and upward under claiming conditions, drew fifteen, with Mrs. J. Rowan's old Muskallonge the 3-to-1 favorite. He was never prominent after the start, however.

The winner was H. G. Bedwell's colt Foreland, which had been given scant consideration by the talent, paying $23 for $2. Foreland was right with the leaders during the early part of the race. He went to the front in the last furlong, winning in a drive from Sam Louis's Lord Baltimore II. The latter raced down Oblique, the early pacemaker, and his efforts told. He held on gamely, however, to gain the place from the Beacon Manor Stable's three-year-old Tempest.

The Aero Handicap was won by P. O. Egan's Peter Pan colt Toyland, 9-0 choice, long shot, which paid his followers $29.20. Harvey Stedman, Traffic and Dizzy Blonde held up the start for nine minutes.

Red Harvey was up on Toyland and gave the colt a good ride. He moved up gradually, and in the stretch challenged H. F. Whitney's Traffic, winning by half a length. The Sagamore Stable's Chocolate Soldier took third.

BOTTOMLEY'S BLOW PUTS CARDS ON TOP

Infield Hit After an Error and Double Sends Cubs to Defeat, 3 to 2.

GAME IS PITCHERS' BATTLE

Kaufmann Allows Only Four Hits, but First-Inning Wildness Helps His Downfall.

ST. LOUIS, Mo., April 17 (AP).—Bottomley's infield hit following closely upon an error and a double broke up a pitchers' battle between Sherdel and Kaufmann and gave the St. Louis Cardinals a 3 to 2 victory over the Chicago Cubs. Kaufmann yielded only four hits, but his wildness in the first inning contributed to his downfall.

His Double Scores Two in Ninth and Tigers Win, 5 to 4.

DETROIT, April 17 (AP).—A whirlwind finish in which the Tigers fell upon Zachary, O'Rourke scoring two men with a double in the ninth, gave Detroit a 5 to 4 victory over St. Louis in the first game of their series today.

The Browns, after trailing three runs for six innings, got their eyes on Holloway's twisters and scored two runs in the seventh and eighth innings from seven hits. Van Gilder, after a bad first inning in which the Tigers scored three runs from as many hits, bore down and allowed only one more hit until he was relieved for a pinch hitter in the eighth inning.

Tiny Osborne daily awaits one ticket to Nashville, and it may come any day. Snooks Dowd, the loan from Jersey City, probably will be returned today without interest.

The Robins will play their first game of the season at Ebbet's Field tomorrow, but no one is supposed to know it. The official opening will be saved for next Thursday, when the Giants travel to Flatbush. Dazzy Vance may be able to work tomorrow afternoon, but if his boils are too troublesome Robert Emmet McGraw will be called to duty.

Matsuyama Posts Cue Forfeit.

Kinrey Matsuyama yesterday posted his second $100 to clinch his challenge for a championship match against Ary Bos, national junior 18.2 balkline champion. Under the rules the champion must defend the emblem every thirty days, and this means that Bos must be prepared to play within ten days or forfeit the title.

Studdy on New Manhattan Card.

A ten-round bout between Willie Harmon, east side welterweight, and Al Studdy of the west side, will be the principal attraction Wednesday night at the re-opening of the New Manhattan S. C. Augie Ratner and Willie Walker will clash in the ten-round semi-final, while in the first ten-round bout Andy (Ike) Tucker will tackle Hatty Gabe.

CHAMPION PIRATES DROP FIRST TO REDS

Rally in Ninth Threatens Donohue's Sway on Mound, but He Emerges Victor, 4-3.

CINCINNATI, April 17 (AP).—Cincinnati took the first game of the season's series with Pittsburgh today, 4 to 3. Donohue held the Pirates in check until the ninth, when they staged a brave but unsuccessful rally. Jake May relieved Donohue with two on base and two out in the last frame and disposed of McInnis, a substitute batter, with a meek foul.

GIANTS TRIUMPHANT MID WINTRY BLASTS

did. Mac fanned three times. He was only up that many times.

The Braves beat everything in sight last month down South. They need a little of that pepper right now.

It is getting almost impossible to keep this Frisch boy from Fordham down. He got two two-baggers yesterday and a walk and scored three of the Giants' four runs.

Genewich took the whole Boston cause in his own hands in the fifth and pickled McQuillan for a triple. It went to waste, for when Gautreau rolled to Jackson the Boston pitcher was out at the plate standing up.

Boston had McQuillan on the run in the fourth and after the Braves put over their two runs and were traveling along nicely they got too all-fired smart and started to run wild on the bases. Exra Hartley's trusty right arm squelched their speed.

Boston here again today. Barnes may deceive for the Giants and maybe Larry Benton for the Braves.

Young Dave Bancroft, who manages the Braves, was in good voice and turned it on Umpire Bob Hart. The general impression was that Banny didn't like Hart's decisions.

R. P. I. BEATS STEVENS IN 12 INNINGS, 6 TO 5

Ties Count in Eighth on Homers by Escholz and Alquist—Aschoff Breaks Ankle.

Special to The New York Times.

TROY, N. Y., April 17.—The Rensselaer Polytechnic Institute baseball team defeated Stevens, 6-5, in a sensational twelve-inning game opening the collegiate season here this afternoon. Cold weather and a high wind made playing ragged, but the teams managed to keep on fairly even terms until the seventh inning when Stevens took the lead.

The Troy Engineers rallied in the eighth with home runs by Alquist and Escholz tying the score at 5-5. Then both Goodrics, on the mound for R. P. I., and Surbeck of Stevens tightened up. In the final half of the twelfth Hoblock was safe on a bunt, stole second and scored the winning run on Alquist's single. Aschoff of Stevens sustained a broken ankle sliding home in the sixth inning.

MANHATTAN QUELLS CRESCENT A. C., 5-2

Fiorenzo and Davis, Freshman Battery, Excels—Former Gives Losers Only Four Safeties.

Manhattan College won its second game in a row yesterday when a freshman battery, George Fiorenzo and John Davis, downed the powerful Crescent Athletic Club nine at Bay Ridge, 5-2. Fiorenzo, former George Washington High School twirler, allowed the hard-hitting former college stars four hits, which, coupled with five passes, netted two runs.

Brascher, with two bingles, one a double, set a pace that the other New Mooners could not follow. With the bases loaded in the third as a result of three passes and with only one out, the Green and White, on fast plays by Cronin and Dunne, retired the side with only a single tally resulting.

The three runs which clinched the encounter for Manhattan came in the sixth inning on a brace of errors, a long double by Red Cronin and Mike Hayes's single to left.

In the eighth inning Lou Freda dashed to deep shortfield to snag Degnan's smash and then threw out his man at first. Degnan revenged himself in the ninth, robbing Freda of a hit after a long run into right field.

Hoyt's failure to bunt successfully cost the Yanks a run in the sixth and also in the eighth, which Collins opened with a double. While Waite was dallying at the plate Collins was picked off second.

Jones had heated words with Umpire Nallin, alleging in part that he had fanned Joe Harris in the first round. Before leaving the party flat at the request of Mr. Huggins, the Squire stopped at the plate and conversed rapidly with Nallin in three tongues.

Eastern Rowing Season to Open Saturday With the Navy Meeting M. I. T. Crews

NAVY CREWS OPEN SEASON SATURDAY

Races With M. I. T. at Annapolis Will Be First Eastern College Events of the Year.

MIDDY VARSITY IS HEAVY

Shows Speed in Addition to Power, but Coach Butler Says He Is Not Entirely Satisfied.

ANNAPOLIS, April 17. — Intercollegiate rowing makes its bow in the East this season with the visit of the Massachusetts Tech rowing squad, under Coach Bill Haines, to the Naval Academy next week, the trip ending with races between the varsity and second crews on Saturday.

The Tech squad will reach Annapolis on Tuesday and will spend the time before Saturday in workouts on the Severn. Much benefit is anticipated from this course, as the water is likely to be in better condition for rowing than it is around Boston, the Navy crews having lost but a few days from practice this Spring.

The race in both instances will be for the Henley distance of a mile and a furlong, which is considered plenty long enough for the crews at this stage of the season. Tech has been improving greatly since Haines took hold, and will not be held lightly by those connected with Naval Academy rowing.

The Navy varsity and second crews took a long row on Wednesday and great strength was indicated in the varsity boat. After paddling well above Round Bay, six miles from the boathouse, the crews started down the river, gradually hitting up the stroke. The varsity soon pulled away from the second boat and completed the home trip almost alone.

Rowing Supervisor Optimistic.

Lieut. Commander William A. Greenman, formerly a Naval Academy crew captain and now representative of the Navy Athletic Association for Rowing, is very sanguine as to the success of the Navy crew this year. He feels that it is one of the most powerful which ever represented the navy, and that Butler is filling the bill as coach in a very acceptable manner.

Butler has proved himself a hard-working and painstaking coach, and the general opinion is that Naval Academy rowing, directed by him, will more than hold its own. Butler is not so optimistic as Lieut. Commander Greenman but continues to devote his attention to securing the form and power he thinks necessary. He believes that the crew will not develop into a fast one until the season is well advanced.

Though Coach Butler has taken the position that the boating of the varsity will not be announced until the day of the race, there is little doubt of the crew which will meet Tech and which is likely to hold together except for casualties. This is the crew which seems likely to start: Bow, Elliott; No. 2, Broadbent; No. 3, Crawford Eddy; No. 4, Born; No. 5, Bagdanovitch; No. 6, Sylvester (captain); No. 7, Watson; stroke, Tom Eddy; coxswain, Seabring.

This crew is one of the heaviest that has ever represented the Naval Academy. The extremes in weight are represented by the Eddy brothers, Tom, at stroke, weighing 192 pounds, and Crawford, No. 3, 179. The latter, however, is very rangy and has plenty of strength and endurance.

Three Other Varsity Men.

In addition to the Eddy brothers, Sylvester, Watson and Born rowed in the varsity last year, and Broadbent and Bagdanovitch are powerful men, the pick of last year's plebe crew and substitutes at Poughkeepsie. The selection of Elliott as bow is a popular one. He has been a member of the squad for three season, rowing one year on the plebe crew and two years on the junior varsity.

The members of the crew probably will lose a little weight as the season progresses, but it will not be a great amount, and the eight probably will be the heaviest the Naval Academy has ever sent to Poughkeepsie. The great regret here is that there will be no meeting with Yale. The Navy will, however, meet three crews which contest with Yale, Pennsylvania, Cornell and Harvard, and some rating may be had from a comparison.

The race here on May 1 with the University of Pennsylvania is anticipated with keen interest. Penn is making a great effort this year, and the meeting with the Navy may have real significance.

HAVERFORD SETS DATES.

Cricket Team Will Compete in Six Philadelphia Cup Matches.

Harvard College will open its cricket season with the Ardmore Cricket Club April 24 on the home crease. Eight games so far have been scheduled, of which six are Philadelphia Cup matches on successive Saturdays.

Twenty-five men reported last week to Coach Godsell and Captain Baker. Godsell arrived recently from Canada and took over the squad from Tattersall, who conducted the Winter practice indoors. Although the team has been hard hit by graduation, T. Garrett, J. Silver, Gordy, Tingley, W. Stokes and Hoag having left the college, it is expected that an eleven will be developed that is up to the usual standard. The dates follow:

April 24, Ardmore C. C., home; May 1, Centennial C. C., home; May 15, Merion C. C., away; May 22, Philadelphia C. C., away; May 29, Wanderers C. C., home; May 31, Centennial C. C., home; June 5, Crescent A. C., home; June 11, Alumni, tentative.

15 ENTER AUTO RACE.

Earl Cooper Among Those Who Will Compete at Altoona in June.

Fifteen entries already have been received for the auto race at the Altoona Speedway on June 12. Only five more will be accepted, because the contest board of the American Automobile Association limits the fields on 1½ mile tracks to twenty starters.

Among the recent entries is Earl Cooper, who is a veteran among veterans. He will race a new 91½ cubic inch motor equipped with a highly developed super-charger. Cooper resumed racing in 1922 at Kansas City when Joe Thomas was stricken suddenly, and persuaded Cooper to take his place. In the last Labor Day race at Altoona Cooper waged a 200-mile battle with Bob McDonogh and Harry Harix which McDonogh won.

YALE STROKE OARS SHIFTED BY LEADER

Laughlin Returns to First Varsity and Francisco Is Advanced From Third to Second.

GOODWIN ALSO GETS TRIAL

Will Pass Back Pace for Third Eight —150 Candidates Report for Class Crews.

DERBY, Conn., April 17.—All the stroke oars in the three Yale varsity crews on the Housatonic have been shifted the past week by Coach Ed Leader. Thomas Irwin Laughlin of Providence has been reinstated as stroke of the first eight, and it is likely that he will pass back the pace in the triangular event in which Yale rows Pennsylvania and Columbia here May 8.

Laughlin proved a brilliant stroke oar as a freshman two seasons ago. Last Spring he was taken from the reserve squad when Al Lindley, the veteran stroke oar, was removed from the boat because of a Faculty complication. Laughlin stroked the Eli eight to victory throughout the season, displaying form which rapidly developed into superb watermanship under the expert coaching of Leader. Laughlin had been kept on the second eight until two or three days ago, but has rapidly returned to his smoothest rowing form since the squad was transferred to the Housatonic.

Whitney on Third Eight.

John Hay Whitney, who has stroked the varsity the past two weeks, has gone to the third eight at No. 6. Whitney was out of college for several weeks, returning last month and is being tried out in the stroke rôle on the varsity. He is not yet in the best physical condition. He is one of the most powerful watermen on the Yale squad and is practically certain to be found in the intercollegiate competition at the close of the season.

Leader has promoted Arthur Francisco from stroke of the third crew to stroke of the second eight, the seat vacated the past week by Laughlin. Francisco stroked the freshmen brilliantly last year and is almost on even terms with Laughlin and Whitney.

Leader has taken Henry Sage Goodwin of Hartford from the reserve squad for trial as stroke of the third eight. Goodwin is a member of the junior class who has figured as reserve and class oarsman for two seasons, but whose development this Spring has been exceptionally rapid.

The make-up changes in the rowing squads have been confined to the stroke oars. The three varsity crews have shown consistent improvement, largely because of the sustained harmony of team effort. Except for rough water on Tuesday and Thursday, weather conditions on the Housatonic have been favorable the past week.

Four Freshman Crews Picked.

Coach George Murphy has organized a fourth freshman crew for work on New Haven Harbor. It will be shifted to this city and the Housatonic the coming week. More than 150 candidates for the interclass crews have reported to Coach Sam Shaw on New Haven Harbor, where the Spring regatta will be held May 3.

Coach Murphy has placed Ben Brewster at No. 6 in the freshman shell and Ralph Paine Jr. at No. 5 the past week. They have been rowing in the second and third eights of the 1929 squad. Brewster is a son of Captain George Brewster of the 1891 crew and Paine is a son of the novelist, who also was a member of the '91 eight.

The complete list of boatings follows:

WILLIAMS OUTLOOK BRIGHT.

New Track Stars Ably Replace Men Who Were Lost by Graduation.

WILLIAMSTOWN, Mass., April 17.—Williams College enjoys fair prospects for another successful track season this Spring, despite the loss of several reliable point winners by graduation. Confidence prevails that Coach Seeley, who has been in charge of this sport here for one third of a century, will develop another winning team which will maintain the Purple's clean record in dual meets, which has been in effect for the past six years.

Captain Taylor is Williams' hope in the dashes. Sterling and Anderson also will participate in these events. A quartet of likely men is available for the 440 in Mackie, Thomas, Keep and Rogers, members of the relay team last winter. Spaulding looks good in the half mile, while Crofts, Adams and McCulloch are a trio of experienced distance runners. In the hurdles, Zinn and Boynton are the best performers.

Williams does not appear to be as promising in the field events, however, although it is well represented in the hammer throw by Greenwood and in the broad and high jumps by Shumway. Anderson and Dougherty are other promising performers in the field events.

Boston University is a newcomer this year on the Purple track schedule which is as follows

May 1, Wesleyan at New Haven; 8, Amherst at Williamstown; 15, Boston University at Williamstown; 22, New England Collegiates at Boston.

Scotland Beats England at Soccer.

MANCHESTER, Eng., April 17 (AP).—Scotland defeated England in the last of the soccer international matches today, 1 to 0.

COLUMBIA IS READY FOR CREW CAMPAIGN

Freshman Eight Will Swing Into Action Saturday Against Kent School on Harlem.

Columbia's 1926 crew campaign will get under way as far as actual competition is concerned next Saturday when the Lion freshman oarsmen meet the Kent School eight on the Harlem. The race will be the first in the régime of Head Coach Richard Glendon Jr. and his father, former Navy rowing mentors, under whose guidance the Blue and White hopes to erase last year's disastrous record and regain its erstwhile rowing prestige.

Morningside yearling shells already have met Kent School combinations on the water on two occasions, in 1923 and 1924, but each time the cubs were forced to take the wake of their opponents' boat. In those races, however, it was the second freshman eight that competed, while it is the 1926 first-string outfit that will represent Columbia on the Harlem Saturday.

Since the varsity and junior varsity will not swing into action until they engage the formidable Yale and Pennsylvania blade-wielders in the annual Derby Day regatta on the Housatonic on May 8, the freshmen will begin their season two weeks earlier than the upper-class first and second aggregations. The yearlings also are due to compete in another race before the Derby classic, in which they also will take part, for they will entertain the Choate School sweep-swingers on the Harlem May 1.

This year's squad of freshman oarsmen is one of the most likely-looking that has turned out on Morningside Heights in several years. As now boated the first cub eight averages about 176 pounds and has two former yearling football men rowing, in Lambart at No. 6 and Davenport, who captained the first-year eleven, at No. 7. Davenport was chosen to stroke the boat for a time, but recently the Glendons made a shift that sent Piercy to the stroke seat.

The other occupants of the first freshman shell are Walker at bow, Danneman at No. 2, Donaldson at No. 3, McBain at No. 4, Lightbourne at No. 5 and Berman as coxswain. Six races are on the card for the cub aggregation, the last three being appearances against the M. I. T. yearligs, in the Childs Cup Regatta and at Poughkeepsie in June. A much lighter Columbia first-year outfit finished third on the Hudson a year ago.

HARD WEEK FOR LAFAYETTE.

Baseball Team Will Play Four Games Away From Home.

EASTON, Pa., April 17.—The most difficult part of the Lafayette College baseball schedule confronts the Maroon players this week. From Wednesday morning until Saturday night the squad will be away from home and during that time will meet four college opponents in the metropolitan district.

The first four games will be staged at West Point against the Army. The team will then drop down to New York, meeting New York University, City College of New York and Fordham on successive days.

These four difficult games, bunched closely together, will be a severe test for Lafayette's rather weak pitching staff. Captain C. Halstead of East Paterson, pitcher and outfielder, is the mainstay of the moundsmen. He is also dangerous at bat and has been used in the No. 4 position in the batting order. It is probable that Halstead may be called upon to hurl both the first and final games of the trip. Finley is the only other experienced pitcher on the squad, so Bill Coughlin, Maroon coach, will be forced to rely on Smith, Burnett, Parry and Miller to carry the team through one or perhaps two of the four games.

Atlanta Gets Gilbert of Yanks.

ATLANTA, April 17 (AP).—The sale of Dutch Krehmeyer, infielder, to the Reading Internationals and purchase of Walter Gilbert, infielder, from the New York Yankees was announced today by Bert Niehoff, Atlanta manager.

DE PALMA WILL RACE ON SPEEDWAY TRACK

Is First to Enter New Jersey Event Set for May 1—Plant Being Rushed to Completion.

Ralph DePalma, veteran of board and dirt speedways, the first driver to enter the international inaugural 300-mile auto race which will open the new mile and a half automobile racing track at Speedway, N. J., May 1, heads one of the greatest arrays of speed demons ever entered in an auto classic in this country. The ellipse, with its straightaways of 1,720 feet is being rushed to completion. The bevels of the turns already have been trued and verified.

The turns, which have been canted to an angle of 45 degrees, and the long straightaways are expected to enable the drivers to attain a speed somewhere in the vicinity of 160 miles an hour. The huge infield will accommodate 10,000 cars and space outside the park has been cleared for an additional 40,000. Accommodations are planned for 200,000 spectators at the speedway, which is located just below Hamhonton, toward Atlantic City, in the State of New Jersey. It is close to Philadelphia and New York, and the Pennsylvania Railroad has located a station on the grounds, known as Speedway, N. J.

Practically every driver of note in America will compete in this classic and at least two of the best European racers will test their skill. Among the eighteen Americans entered are Peter De Paolo, winner of the national title last year, who started off the season by winning the inaugural race at the Miami Fulford Bowl. Dave Lewis and his front wheel drive, powered with the smallest motor ever used in competition, having a displacement of only 91 cubic inches, will be among the favored drivers.

Bob McDonough, Ralph Hepburn, former motorcycle driver; Earl Cooper, Bennett Hill and Leon Duray are other capable drivers who will be at the starting line. Vicomte Rochefoucauld and Prince Girorgio Giorgini, who will pilot the little Bugatti cars, will represent Europe. There is a possible chance of other foreign pilots coming here.

WASHINGTON CREWS POINT TOWARD EAST

Drills Are Aimed Toward Lifting Poughkeepsie Honors This Spring.

MANY SHIFTS ARE MADE

Varsity Veterans Are Sent to Second Crew and New Men Gain First Eight Berths.

SEATTLE, Wash., April 17.—Eastern crews who would win the intercollegiate rowing championship on the Hudson River at Poughkeepsie this June must once again reckon with the University of Washington oarsmen. Even more than last year, when the Huskies finished a close second to the powerful Naval Academy eight, will the Purple and Gold threaten its rivals in the classic of June 28.

Reports, coming to the Northwest concerning the eights that will pull the gruelling four miles for the championship now held by the Navy have it that they are powerful, big and show promise. That is probably so, but the Huskies too are still tall, big, powerful and show promise, and what is more, the eights that Coach Russell S. (Rusty) Callow is working at present have veterans that have stood the test.

Before the Huskies once again show their prowess to the rowing world at Poughkeepsie they will match their skill and stamina against Princeton on Lake Carnegie early in June. Princeton recently invited the Huskies to race and Washington accepted. It will give the men of Callow a chance to get into actual competition in the East against a strong aggregation before the final race at Poughkeepsie. It will be a dual between two eights coached under the same system. Princeton's mentor is a former Washington oarsman, Charles Logg.

Radical Shifts Made.

Despite the presence of experienced men, Callow has done not a little shifting in an effort to find his strongest combination, and even though Washington has been on the water since the middle of October, with only a short lay-off, the noted mentor is far from settled on his boatings.

The varsity line-up at the present time has four veterans who rowed in the first boat at Poughkeepsie. They are Capt. Al Ubrickson, stroke; Harrison Sanford, No. 7; Hal Condon, No. 5, and Norman Sonju, No. 3. Tom Quast, No. 4 in the varsity on the Hudson, is sitting at No. 6 in the junior varsity boat. The other men in the varsity are Jim Hart, No. 6; Homer Kerns, No. 4; Jim Hathews, No. 2, and Marius Glerup, bow.

Mathews was stroke of the victorious Jayvee eight on the Hudson and sat at No. 5 in the boat that pulled far away from California last year. Hart rowed at No. 2 in the Jayvees at Poughkeepsie and had varsity experience against California at No. 3. Kerns is a letter man but failed to win a place at Poughkeepsie. Glerup is the only man who up to this year had not been in the varsity or junior varsity shell.

Perhaps the keenest fight raging is for the coxswain's seat. It's a toss-up between Frank Blethen, victorious coxswain of the junior varsity and Art Wuthenow, who held the rudder ropes for the varsity. Callow says he doesn't know who to pick, and his actions certainly bear that statement out.

Arneson Shows Promise.

Anything may happen in the personnel of Washington's crews. No man has a place cinched with Rusty Callow. In the junior varsity eight there are Arneson, stroke; Fricke, No. 7; Quast, No. 6; Richter, No. 5; Olmsted, No. 4; Sparling, No. 3; Menke, No. 2; Bolles, bow. Gus Arneson is a new man and has showed plenty of promise. He may make a good stroke for the Jayvees. Sparling, Menke and Bolles are the only men who sat in the junior varsity boat, while Quast has been in the varsity. Bolles rowed in the J. V. shell two years ago, while Sparling and Menke raced last year. The others come up from the many boatings farther down the line.

If the varsity line-up is in doubt the second eight most certainly is. For when one looks over the third boat he can see McGuinnes at stroke and he was at No. 4 in the Jayvee last year then there is Melder at No. 2, and he was at two in the second eight while in the fourth boat is Armstrong at No. 6, who was carried as a sub to the championship race. Ted Keith, who was also taken to Poughkeepsie is out at present, recuperating from a recent operation.

SYRACUSE OARSMEN 3 WEEKS BEHIND

Ten Eyck Will Not Pick Regulars Until Men Show Real Racing Ability.

FITCH PROBABLE STROKE

Veteran Expected to Be Pacemaker —Gordon, Thompson and Lawrence Other Promising Men.

Special to The New York Times.

SYRACUSE, N. Y., April 17.—Oarsmen of Syracuse University continued their training drills on the waters of Seneca River this week, but their work failed to brighten the gloomy outlook for the season. James A. Ten Eyck, veteran coach, is still without enthusiasm over the development of the material left him this year following scholastic failures and the loss of candidates through other causes.

Continued cold weather and blustery winds are retarding the progress of the crews. The men are now three weeks behind in their training as compared with other seasons when the ice broke up early in the river and the weather was mild.

Coach Ten Eyck's varsity squad comprises varsity and junior varsity candidates, but he will not designate the regular crews until the men develop real racing ability. Among the experienced oarsmen is George Fitch, who stroked the crew last year. He is again in that position and is regarded as a capable pacemaker.

Other outstanding men are Captain Gordon; Thompson, who rowed junior varsity last year, and Lawrence, who was a member of the freshman crew which won the 1925 intercollegiate title. Both the varsity and junior varsity boats average about 175 pounds.

Syracuse will not open its season until May 22, when it faces the Navy oarsmen.

This leaves Ten Eyck about a month in which to whip his crews into shape. He is bringing all the experience of his twenty-two years as a coach to bear upon the situation, but is not optimistic over the prospect of success.

NIGHT MEET FOR P. S. A. L.

Crowded Schedule Forces Holding of May 7 Track Games in Evening.

An innovation in Public Schools Athletic League activities is to be undertaken this year in connection with the annual high school novice outdoor track and field games. Because of the crowded scholastic outdoor schedule the P. S. A. L. authorities have found it necessary to schedule this feature as a twilight affair and have, accordingly, placed the games on the calendar for the evening of May 7, beginning at 6 o'clock, at Brooklyn Athletic Field.

Stone Must Not Box for Year.

PHILADELPHIA, April 17 (AP).—Ad Stone, who was knocked out by Tony Marrullo last Monday in the second round, has been ordered to give up boxing for at least a year by his manager, Max Hoff.

Hard Hitting by N. Y. U. Beats Syracuse Nine and Villanova Trounces Princeton

N. Y. U. TROUNCES SYRACUSE, 14 TO 3

Lays Down Barrage of 14 Hits and Wins Season's Fourth Straight Here.

BOMBARDS VAN LENGEN

Drives Orange Pitching Ace to Cover in Sixth—Violet Fielders Flash Three Double Plays.

The New York University baseball team did the expected and easily defeated the Syracuse nine on Ohio Field yesterday afternoon. The score was 14 to 3. Coach McCarthy used Rosenberg, who has not pitched since 1924, to turn back Syracuse. He allowed them only seven scattered hits. The Violet batters meanwhile hit Syracuse with everything but the memorial flagpole and hung up the fourth consecutive victory of the season.

After a slow start N. Y. U. turned on a dazzling exhibition of batting and fielding that included three double plays. Syracuse meanwhile tried its hardest, but could do little against the air-tight Violet defense.

N. Y. U. scored three runs in the fourth when Watson slammed a homer over the right-field fence; six runs in the fifth when the entire batting order paraded to the plate and four runs in the eighth when three doubles and a single followed each other in succession. Another run got into the Violet column in the seventh, but it hardly stirred the thousand shivering spectators. In all the Violet got fourteen hits, knocking Van Lengen, the Orange ace, out of the box in the sixth.

Violet Starts Slowly.

Notwithstanding the battering ram finish the Violet had a slow time getting under way against Van Lengen. For three innings N. Y. U. didn't get a hit. Syracuse gained an early lead by rushing across a run in the opening inning that looked very big for three frames. This tally developed when Rosenberg gave one of his three bases on balls to Ringwood who was advanced by Richman's sacrifice. A clean single over second by Peck scored the runner. However Syracuse was cut down after that and the side retired.

The barren early innings for the Violet were relieved when Davis got a scratch hit past second base in the fourth and Lincoln singled to right. Davis and Lincoln were the only Violet batters to get three hits in the game. Each was at bat five times.

When Lincoln singled, Davis got to third. On the throw to catch him, however, Lincoln advanced to second. With a man on second and third and his head nearly twisted off with watching them, Van Lengen completed a balk on which Davis scored. Then Watson finished off matters nicely by dropping his home run on the doorstep of Gould Hall.

In the sixth, the Violet's biggest inning, things started inauspiciously enough. Rosenberg struck out. Madison singled and Francis got on with an infield hit. Ingram singled to right, scoring Madison. David doubled to centre scoring Francis. Lincoln beat out a hit and filled the bases. Watson walked, forcing in Ingram. Stewart sacrificed tot ceentre, scoring Davis, and Boyd singled, scoring Lincoln and Watson.

Rosenberg Gets Single.

Rosenberg, in his second time at bat, was infected with the hitting fever and also singled. Ingram, however, hit to short on his second trip to the plate and forced Rosenberg at second.

One of the Violet double plays nipped a budding Syracuse rally right where it did the most good—for N. Y. U. Van Iengen started the sixth by hitting a nice single. Ringwood singled to right field and all on the Syracuse bench stood up and yelled, for none were out. Van Lengen, however, tried to beat Stewart's arm to third and failed. Even so, only one was out and the heavy Syracuse hitters were coming up. Richman slammed a hot drive straight at Rosenberg. The Violet pitcher proved that he could so something with his hands besides throw by catching the drive, hot as it was. He flipped the ball to Francis, catching Ringwood, and the side was out.

RALLY IN 9TH SAVES GAME FOR HARVARD

Two Out and Two on Base When Jones Hits Single, Beating Wesleyan, 7 to 6.

HAD BEEN AHEAD, 5 TO 0

Wesleyan Then Scores Three Each in Eighth and Ninth to Get Lead Momentarily.

Special to The New York Times.

CAMBRIDGE, Mass., April 17.—Bill Jones, Harvard centre fielder, singled over second base in the ninth inning after two were out with a man on second and third, to give the Crimson a 7 to 6 victory over Wesleyan this afternoon on Soldiers' Field.

Harvard lead 5 to 0 going into the eighth inning, but the visitors took advantage of four Harvard errors coupled with five hits and a pass and scored three runs in the eighth and three more in the ninth to give them a 6 to 5 lead.

Ullman, first batter in the ninth, singled over second base, and Coach Mitchell sent Knowlton in to run for him. The latter was sacrificed to second by Sullivan and Chauncey reached first as the catcher dropped the third strike. After Slayton, hitting for Booth had flied out, Jones came up and on the first ball pitched brought in the two runs.

The cold wind kept the spectators down to 300 and bothered the fielders on flies.

Barbee, whom Coach Mitchell delegated for pitching assignment, twirled splendid ball for the first seven innings, holding the Connecticut aggregation to two hits. In the ninth Barbee was taken out after Wesleyan had taken their lead. Then with men on first and second with two out, Booth, relief pitcher, came in and struck Guthrie out and received credit for the victory. Kennedy, the Wesleyan moundsman, not only twirled well but sent seven Crimson players back to the bench on strike-outs.

Two runs were made in the Crimson half of the second. Todd was safe on Funk's error and Tobin reached first on a wild throw by Ruppreeht. Ullman sacrificed both men, and Sullivan and Chauncey laced out singles.

In the fifth, Ellison sent a hard grounder past first base. Silloway, Wesleyan right fielder, failed to stop it and the Crimson leader came all the way home on it. In the sixth a pass to Barbee and hits by Jones and Zarakov were responsible for another run.

In the seventh, Sullivan reached first on Wielland's error, stole second and scored on Chauncey's hit. In the Wesleyan ninth, the Harvard fielders fell flat. Three consecutive errors by the infield with a pass and a hit off Barbee were good for three runs.

Visitors Hit Josephson Hard While Whalen Holds Local Batters in Check.

Providence College hit Josephson hard yesterday afternoon, took advantage of several miscues by City College infielders and consequently defeated the Lavender by a 6 to 0 score. The home talent, with a revamped batting order, found Whalen, the Rhode Island slab star, for nine safeties, but fast fielding and heady pitching always prevented them from crossing the rubber.

Providence found Josephson easy to hit, slapping out twelve hits, including four doubles, and had men on the paths every inning. Aiken starred with the willow for Providence, getting on the bases every time at bat, three times hitting for two bases and the fourth time reaching first on an error. McLaughlin, Flynn and Whalen, with a brace of hits each, also were prominent at bat.

Coach Parker in an effort to bolster his hitting benched Donstein, Rossi and Starr. The change proved to do more harm than good, for Reich, who played second base, in addition to getting no hits, twice made errors that figured in the scoring. Hodesblatt, veteran catcher, with three singles led the Lavender hitters.

Whalen had City College well in hand and except for the sixth frame was never in difficulty. City College filled the sacks in this inning on singles by Ephron, Hodesblatt and Rankin, but Whalen bore down and got both Reich and Rensselaer on fouls to Halloran and fanned Moder.

Prcvidence scored in the first when O'Brien was safe on Ephron's error; Allen doubled over the right-field wall, putting O'Brien on third, and Doyle brought him in on a long sacrifice fly. Another run was picked up in the third inning. O'Brien reached first base when Josephson hit him, and on a hit-and-run play Allen cracked out his second double, a long hit to left, which scored O'Brien all the way from first.

Coupling hits with errors and taking advantage of Josephson's wildness, Providence scored again in the fourth, fifth and ninth innings, while Whalen held the Lavender in check.

N. Y. U. FRESHMAN HURLS NO-HIT, NO-RUN GAME

Manfredi Holds Concordia Prep Helpless in 7-Inning Contest—Violet Yearlings Win, 7-0.

Manfredi, star pitcher of the New York University freshman baseball team, turned in his first no-hit no-run game yesterday afternoon when he blanked the Concordia Prep team in a seven-inning game played at Bronxville. The score was 7 to 0. Manfredi struck out ten men and allowed no bases on balls. The game was called at the end of the seventh inning by agreement.

The victory was the second scored this season by the Violet yearlings. Six runs in the first three innings gave the Violet a long lead on Concordia even without Manfredi's flawless pitching. Gallagher doubled with three men on the bases to help out in the first inning and later Manfredi and Conroy hit triples., Barry and Farrar also hit doubles.

Princeton Freshmen Win at Track.

Special to The New York Times.

PRINCETON, N. J., April 17.—Through superior strength in the field events, the Princeton freshman track team defeated Lawrenceville by a 77 2-3 to 43 1-3 count in Palmer Stadium this afternoon. Joe Caldwell starred for the yearlings with victories in the hammer throw and discus.

CROWLEY TO SPEED COLUMBIA DRILLS

Coach, Handicapped by Small Squad, Will Close Spring Football Work in Two Weeks.

With the first week of Spring football practice at Columbia completed Head Coach Charley Crowley and his five assistants are planning two weeks of intensive drilling for the men who are taking part in gridiron activities at Baker Field. Last year the Spring training period lasted five weeks, with a consequent slump in interest in the closing days, but the present grind is merely of three weeks' duration.

Coach Crowley has been greatly handicapped in the opening week of practice by the small size of the squad. Thirty-four men were on the field in uniform for Monday's initial workout, but since then the average attendance has been about twenty-five. Many of last season's regulars, substitutes and freshmen football men are now competing in other forms of athletic activity, baseball alone engaging the services of seven men who were regulars or substitutes on the varsity eleven last Fall.

Among those attending the drills throughout the week just ended were Captain-elect Bill Madden and Mike Sesit, veteran back-field aces, who are counted upon to be the offensive and defensive mainstays of the Lion backfield quartet in the 1926 campaign. Hick Brady, the sophomore who won a regular job as an end last year, is also among the Spring gridiron workers, but these three are the only men taking part in the drills who were regulars last season. Coach Crowley is hoping for a greatly increased turnout this week.

FOOTBALL PRACTICE CLOSES AT N. Y. U.

Progress of Squad of Sixty Causes Meehan to Shorten Spring Football Drills.

TRACK TEAM GETS 23 MEN

Baseball, Lacrosse and Tennis Also Draw Gridiron Aspirants—Briante Shows Up Well.

The most successful Spring football practice ever conducted at New York University came to an end yesterday afternoon just before the baseball game with Syracuse when Coach Chick Meehan dismissed his squad of sixty men. Not in the memory of any football veteran on University Heights has the spirit of the men been so high, their work so energetic and their progress so great. Despite the fact that most of the members of the squad are also candidates for other teams at the University, Meehan had sixty men out for practice, six days a week for two weeks without an absentee. As soon as Meehan called an end to the football practice, coaches from other sports claimed many of the men.

Twenty-three football men joined Coach von Elling's track squad, four joined the lacrosse team, Bill McCarthy, coach of the baseball team, claimed eight, and Jack Weinheimer, coach of the freshman baseball team, corralled eleven more. Three also reported for practice with the tennis team.

Meehan originally intended to have practice for three weeks, but the good attendance and the amount of work accomplished induced him to shorten the session. He was able to hold his first scrimmage on the day following the reporting of the squad, so good was the physical condition of the men. So much good material is available, both from last year's varsity and freshman teams and from other sources, that Meehan said he was entirely at a loss to select his first-string players. They all look alike on the field and no position is sure for any man, announced Meehan at the close of practice. The player who gets a berth on the 1926 team will be the one who earns it, continued Meehan.

Much interest was attracted by Frank Briante, fullback last season and high point scorer of the team. In practice Briante was the same plunging back that he was in competition, and Meehan expressed himself as pleased with his work.

In the backfield with Briante in many of the scrimmages was Jack Connors, triple threat and star punter of last year's team. Alternating with these two were Archie Roberts, quarterback from last year's freshman team, and Kenneth Strong, another freshman backfield star. Other former yearling players who performed creditably were Ashton, Buckley, Norton and Riordan. Two letter men who distinguished themselves in the backfield were Eddie Fisher and Charles Roselle.

Meehan paid much attention to his line men, and it is expected that when the Violet takes the field this Fall it will have practically a new line-up in the forward wall. The only veteran likely to remain is John Miller at tackle. Dunn, who held down the other tackle berth, has been shifted to centre, where he is working successfully with Higgins, Assarian, Vye, Lanzetta and Weiner.

NAVY BEATS CATHOLIC U.

ANNAPOLIS, Md., April 17.—In winning from Catholic University here this afternoon, by 10 to 4, the Naval Academy batsmen found Devin for six hits and four runs in the sixth.

Myers, one of the Navy's most promising pitchers, but whose work has been injured by his wildness, was in fair form. Only in one inning, the seventh, did the visitors get more than one hit off him.

TIGERS BEATEN, 7-4, BY VILLANOVA BATS

Three Princeton Pitchers Are Pounded for 13 Hits—Fielding of Losers Is Poor.

JACOB, MASCIADRI STAR

Blue and White Players Take Batting Honors With Three Hits Each—Slagle Triples.

Special to The New York Times.

PRINCETON, N. J., April 17.—Villanova went on a batting spree against Princeton here this afternoon, pounding three Tiger pitchers for thirteen safeties and winning the annual diamond contest, 7 to 4. It was the first time that a Villa Nova nine has conquered the Orange and Black since the beginning of the series in 1910.

Griffith, Blue and White star moundsman, yielded six hits, but they were well scattered. In the final frame he weakened, and after going eight and a third innings gave way to Crane, who managed to withstand the Tiger rally. Erratic fielding proved disastrous to the Tigers throughout the contest, and it was not until the last half of the ninth that they solved Griffith's delivery, to score three times.

Jacobs, Villanova catcher, and Masciadri took the batting honors, planting three safe hits each and scoring four of the visitors' runs. Griffith, besides starring on the mound, made the longest hit of the season so far with a triple into deep left field during the sixth inning. Goeltz opened for Princeton on the mound. After showing more or less form for six frames, allowing eight hits, he gave way to Rankin, who allowed two in as many frames, while Hendey allowed three in the last.

In the final inning Princeton filled the bases twice, but could collect only three runs. Griffith walked two, Lewis reached first on Cotter's error and Griffith forced in the first run by walking Lackey.

Slagle then doubled, scoring Lewis and Scharnikow. A walk of Crane, who had replaced Griffith, again filled the bases, but Prior and Rhees were out in succession, halting the rally.

Union College Is Defeated by Crescent A. C. in Lacrosse Match at Bay Ridge

CRESCENT TWELVE CONQUERS UNION, 7-3

Strong Attack and Superior Defense Win Lacrosse Match for New Mooners.

VICTORS GAIN EARLY LEAD

Outplay Up-State Team at the Start and Hold Three-Goal Advantage at Half-Time.

The Crescent Athletic Club lacrosse team chalked up another victory by defeating the Union College twelve by a 7 to 3 score on the Crescent field in Bay Ridge yesterday afternoon. A stronger attack and a superior defense enabled the New Mooners to defeat the up-Staters. Union recently defeated the Oxford-Cambridge team, which will meet the Crescent twelve in Brooklyn next Saturday. The game next Saturday will be the only appearance of the Britishers in this city during their tour of the United States.

Crescent got the jump on Union early in the game, as Scott scored two minutes after the opening whistle. From that time on the local team never relinquished the lead, being ahead 5 to 2 at half time. The play continued around the Union goal and, although the defense of the Schenectady players was good, McCormack scored next. Union rallied strongly following this goal and Clifford, second attack for the visitors, ran the ball down the field for the first Union goal.

Crescent, however, again assumed the upper hand, and in quick succession Wilbourne, Brower and Dittmar scored. Wilbourne scored on a pass from Joblonka, captain of lacrosse at N. Y. U. recently. Union scored its second goal in the period after a nice play by Hessen, substitute third attack. By a subterfuge he drew Barnard, the Crescent goal keeper, out of position, and shot the goal.

Union played hard in the second period and held the Crescent on more even terms. However, they could not prevent goals by Scott and Frost. McDonald scored for Union in this period.

PRINCETON CONQUERS STEVENS TWELVE, 7-3

Runs Up 6-1 Lead in First Half, but Is Held in Check in Second Period.

Stevens Tech lost its second lacrosse game of the season to the Princeton twelve yesterday afternoon at Hoboken, 7-3. Princeton began the scoring after seven minutes of play with a shot by Thulin off the edge of the net. Terrell then tied the score with a long shot. During the remainder of the period the Princeton defense was impenetrable, while the attack added five points with successive goals by Anderson, Stevens, Gartner, Thulin and Thompson.

In the second period the Engineers presented a much stronger defense and held the visitors scoreless until the final minutes of the game, Polch making two goals for Stevens. Thulin and Parker were the outstanding players for Princeton, while Polch and Captain Finsterbusch led the home team's attack.

Twelves Wage Bitter Battle That Is Not Decided Until Five Minutes Before End.

Special to The New York Times.

NEW HAVEN, Conn., April 17.—Yale won a stubbornly contested lacrosse game from New York University today, 3 to 2. The teams were perfectly balanced and the visitors were forcing the play and threatening the tying goal when the referee's final whistle sounded. Nelson scored the deciding goal for Yale in the last five minutes of the game.

The defensive exhibition given by Gold of New York University featured the play of both teams. In the first half Reed of Yale also made a dazzling stop which prevented the visitors from tying the score.

Yale had a slight advantage during the first half, and the play was even, but brimming with high quality lacrosse throughout the second. Roughness prevailed during the first half, Weeks being injured and retiring with a badly bruised hip. Yale led at intermission, two goals to one.

PENN STATE TWELVE WINS.

Triumphs Over Penn, 10-6, After 4-4 Tie at End of First Half.

PHILADELPHIA, April 17.—Penn State vanquished Pennsylvania at lacrosse this afternoon, 10 to 6, on Franklin Field. A strong rally in the second half enabled the Nittany Lions to gain the verdict, after the first period had ended with the score 4-4. Helbig, football star, and Belfield tallied three points apiece for Penn State, while Moore scored half of Penn's points.

Behind the sterling pitching of Nick Nekola, Evander Childs High School defeated the James Monroe High School, 6 to 3, yesterday at Catholic Protectory Oval, in a P. S. A. L. game. Nekola struck out sixteen men and allowed only one hit while he was in the box.

Nekola was replaced by Easty for two-thirds of an inning in order to give the latter a workout, and in that space of time three of the four James Monroe hits were made and all of their runs scored. Coach Siegel switched Nekola back from right field and the uprising subsided. Thereafter James Monroe got no more hits or runs.

Evander clinched the victory early in the contest by scoring three runs in the first and three runs in the third inning. James Monroe scored its runs in the seventh inning. Brandt and Greenberg hit doubles.

12 RECORDS BROKEN IN OHIO STATE MEET

Michigan and Illinois Athletes Each Score 4 Firsts in University Division.

BOTH HURDLES TO GUTHRIE

Kennedy and Little Collapse as Stellam Noses Them Out to Win Distance Medley.

COLUMBUS, Ohio, April 17 (AP).—Honors were widely scattered in the annual Ohio relays today at Ohio State University stadium. Twelve meet records were broken in thirty-six major events.

Illinois and Michigan each scored four firsts in the university division, with Ohio State trailing closely with three and Wisconsin with two. In the college division Ohio Wesleyan, Michigan State Normal and Michigan State College athletes were outstanding.

Among Class A high schools, Urbana (Ill.) athletes attracted chief attention. Urbana sprinters captured two events and St. John's Military Academy of Wisconsin took another of the nine in that division.

Interest centred in the two hurdle races, the 120-yard high and 220-yard low, in the university division. George Guthrie, Ohio State captain and national hurdle champion, and Wenner, Illinois captain and Guthrie's opponent in numerous hurdle races in the last two years, were the principal contestants.

Guthrie won both, and in the high hurdles set a meet record of 15 seconds flat, bettering his former mark by two-tenths of a second. Guthrie received as prizes two gold watches, but presented one to Wenner.

Athletes Shiver in Cold.

A chill wind swept through the open end of the Stadium, with leaden skies overhead, as the meet got under way. Overcoated spectators and scantily clothed athletes alike shivered in the breeze as the flag-raising and attendant ceremonies were performed.

A sensational finish was witnessed in the distance medley relay for universities, which was won by Illinois. Kennedy, Ohio State two-miler, led until he reached the homestretch, when he was overtaken by Little of Indiana. Then both were nosed out by Stellam of Illinois, who finished apparently fresh. The other two were assisted from the track.

Michigan won the 100-yard dash, 880-yard relay and hammer throw, and its mile relay team set a record of 3 minutes 23.1 seconds. In winning the 100-yard dash Michigan captured all three places. The time of Hester, the winner, was three-tenths of a second behind DeHart Hubbard's mark of 0:9 8-10.

Illinois Strong in Field Events.

Illinois was strong in field events. After White had won the pole vault, his team-mate, Lyon, set a new meet record for the shot-put, triathlon, universities and colleges, at 44 feet 6½ inches, and then hung up another in the shot-put, universities and colleges, open, at 45 feet 1⅝ inches. The Illini team in the distance medley race set a record of 10 minutes 46.4 seconds.

Besides Guthrie's performances, Ohio State won the high jump when Anson quit at 6 feet 3-1 16 inches, a meet record but not Anson's best.

Other university winners were: Wisconsin, mile team and javelin triathlon; Notre Dame, two-mile relay.

In the college division Detroit won the shot-put, Colgate took the 100-yard dash and mile relay, Cornell of Iowa the two-mile relay, Bethany the broad jump, Michigan State Normal the discus, distance medley and 880-yard relay, while Michigan State College made the best time, 44.5 seconds, in the two heats of the Spring medley event.

The official scorer tonight announced that Hawkins of Michigan won the triathlon with a total of 2,231 points. Shively of Illinois was second, Aliman of Michigan State Normal third, Nelson, Iowa, fourth, and Lovette, Michigan, fifth.

SYRACUSE DEFEATS OXFORD-CAMBRIDGE

Hansen's Goal Beats Britons, 1-0, in Lacrosse Match in Archbold Stadium.

LOSERS' DEFENSE STRONG

But Thrusts at Orange Net Are Few—Adshead of Invaders Holds Bizik Scoreless.

Special to The New York Times.

SYRACUSE, N. Y., April 17.—Syracuse University's lacrosse team defeated the Oxford-Cambridge team, 1 to 0, in Archbold Stadium this afternoon. Captain Carl Hansen netted the winning shot, following a pass from Handy after 18 minutes of play in the first half. Hansen's effort was a long, low drive that whizzed by Goalkeeper Bordon before he had a chance to stop it.

The British team seldom penetrated to a good scoring position and on the few occasions when it did, its thrusts were smothered or so hurried that accuracy in shooting was out of the question. Most of the way the visitors deployed on defense and they resisted every effort of Syracuse with a stubborn defense.

Adshead, the visiting centre, was the most active member of his team. He dogged Bizik from start to finish so that the latter was unable to get in the scoring tries that featured his work against Rutgers last week. Bernie Kopkind played a slashing game at out home.

Harvey Levy was the outstanding defense man for Syracuse. Levy loomed in front of the British attackers as large as Gibraltar.

UNITED HUNTS MEET TO OPEN THIS WEEK

Two-Day Session, Starting Saturday, Will Usher in Racing Season at Belmont Terminal.

STRONG FIELD IN INITIAL

Biltmore Steeplechase Also to Be Feature on First Day—Other News of the Turf.

Local turf enthusiasts who did not go South during the Winter and who have been unable to take a trip to Maryland for the early Spring sport will have their first taste of racing next Saturday afternoon, when the United Hunts Racing Association opens its two-day meeting at the Belmont Park terminal, where everything is in readiness for the bugle. The second day of the meeting will be a week from tomorrow, Monday, April 26.

The new grand stand at the Terminal has been completed, the turf course has been rolled and the brush and timber courses have been put in the best of shape. These courses should be in better condition than ever before and, given fine weather, it is expected that a big crowd will turn out in support of the amateurs.

Some of the best flat racers in training may be seen in the Initial Handicap on the opening day, this being a dash of six furlongs in which the added money is $2,000. The Biltmore Steeplechase of $1,500, over about two miles of brush, will attract the jumpers.

The features of the Monday card are the Sporting Plate, for two-year-olds, at four and one-half furlongs, and the Cotton Exchange Steeplechase of $1,500, at about two miles over the brush. The Sporting Plate is a subscription race. Three horses were named for each subscription of $100 on April 1, the one to start to be named five days before the race. All moneys will go to the winner, while the United Hunts will add a piece of gold plate of the value of $1,000.

Among the nominations for the Saratoga Cup, to be run over the course of a mile and three-quarters next August, is imported Imperial Eagle, a son of White Eagle, one of the National Stud stallions at the Curragh of Kildare in Ireland. Imperial Eagle is the property of James W. Corrigan of Cleveland, Ohio, who has been racing abroad for some years. Mr. Corrigan was a partner of Price McKinney in the Kingston Stud a number of years ago in this country. Like other Americans, Mr. Corrigan has found pleasure in racing abroad. That he is to divide his stable is welcome news. This is the practice of Joseph E. Widener, who maintains an extensive French establishment, but whose main racing interests are in this country.

With the near approach of the opening of the New York season interest in the morning training gallops is growing and larger numbers than ever turn out during the early workouts. Belmont Park has a greater quota of horses in training than the other tracks hereabouts, and has, consequently, been most in favor. President Widener has encouraged morning visits to Belmont, as did Major Belmont when Papyrus and Epinard were preparing for their international matches.

Muskallonge, off poorly, ran a good race.

Club Steak, in nearest pursuit of the leaders throughout, drew clear in the stretch under pressure, but was taken in hand at the end. Red Rocket showed good speed and disposed of Dignus entering the stretch, but could not withstand the winner's challenge. A. P. Canale gradually improved his position on the outside. Dignus tired in the last furlong. The Heathen finished well. Best Friend displayed early speed. Witchery and Miniator broke slowly and were never prominent.

Cudgeller, far back in the early running, steadily improved his position. He wore Single Foot down and won going away. He bore in slightly the final stride and caused Turner to cease up. Single Foot in the closing stride fought for place in pursuit of the latter throughout. Traced Lounger into submission, but weakened in the final sixteenth. RICKARD ANGLING FOR LEONARD BOUT

Clash With Walker for Welterweight Title Looming for Yankee Stadium Ring.

CHALLENGER IN CONDITION

Closes Vaudeville Tour This Week and Will Engage in Exhibition Bout at Hakoah Soccer Opener.

By JAMES P. DAWSON.

Thwarted, to all intents and purposes, in his attempts for two championship matches of more than average appeal, Promoter Tex Rickard now is casting about on a new tack and struggling for a title match which will satisfy the demands of the boxing populace and please boxing officials as well.

The State Athletic Commission has frowned on a heavyweight title bout between Jack Dempsey and Gene Tunney, and this official frown has extended, too, to the proposed Tiger Flowers-Mickey Walker world's middleweight title bout, though the reasons are hard to explain. Nothing daunted, however, Rickard already has launched plans to snare the long deferred meeting between Walker and Benny Leonard, retired undefeated world's lightweight champion.

Reports are current again that Leonard contemplates a return to the ring. The lure of the reained canvas is proving too strong, it is said, for the thespian, and there seems to be more of foundation supporting the latest rumors than has existed heretofore. There is also the rather enticing bait of $150,000 or so which would be Leonard's end for a meeting with Walker, for, regardless of the delay and the retired champion's long absence from ring activity, Leonard now is Leonard and always will be Leonard, from a ring standpoint, in his appeal.

Champion Keen for Bout.

There is a strong possibility of this match materializing in July or August at the Yankee Stadium. Walker is keen for the battle. Rickard has already instituted negotiations to get Leonard. The promoter, it was learned yesterday, communicated with the retired lightweight champion before embarking on the trip to Chicago and other undetermined points which is expected to end in Rickard's signing Dempsey to a blank contract to defend his heavyweight title during the coming outdoor season. Rickard, it is understood found Leonard in a responsive mood and the promoter is hopeful.

Love of his mother has been Leonard's barrier to a ring come back in the past. It was to satisfy his mother that he retired at the height of his career, when there were no other lightweights to conquer and it was to satisfy his mother, whose health would be jeopardized because of worry if he returned to the ring, that Leonard turned a deaf ear to proposals that he again don the gloves for a battle with Walker.

But a way around this obstacle is presenting itself, according to latest developments. Ma Leonard plans a trip to Europe for an extensive tour next month, it is said, and with his mother away from the immediate battleground, the cause for worry will be lessened. This is the theory on which Leonard is proceeding and, unless his plans are upset, Leonard hopes soon to announce his return to the ring to battle Walker.

As a prelude to returning, Leonard will done the gloves for an exhibition bout on April 25 at the Polo Grounds. It was learned yesterday that the retired champion has been prevailed upon to lend his modest efforts to making a success of the soccer game in which the Hakoah team of Vienna will make its initial appearance here.

Leonard at Scranton This Week.

Leonard has but one more week of vaudeville work before his twenty-six weeks' tour ends. He leaves today for Scranton where he plays for three days and then with three days before the footlights in Wilkes-Barre, Benny will wind up theatrical work. He is reported in good condition, despite his long lay-off and it is expected that with an intensive training campaign he could whip himself into shape to enter the ring in July or August.

Annual Brooklyn Horse Show to Open on Tuesday With Record Entry of 1,000

BROOKLYN SHOW TO OPEN TUESDAY

1,000 Horses, Record Entry, to Compete in 34th Annual at Riding and Driving Club.

MAYOR WALKER WILL RIDE

Has Entered Cedar King, Fine Chestnut Gelding — Many Champions to Compete.

More than 1,000 horses will be shown in the thirty-fourth annual exhibition of the Brooklyn Horse Show at the Riding and Driving Club, beginning Tuesday, according to an announcement yesterday. This number of horses will make the coming event the largest in the history of the show. Eighty classes will be shown, divided among saddle horses, hunters, jumpers, polo ponies and harness horses.

Featuring the entries in the saddle classes is that of Mayor Walker with Cedar King. Cedar King is a chestnut gelding, 15.1 hands high, and one of the finest looking animals hereabouts. This horse formerly was named Red Cedar and was named by George Crouch, who owned him at the time. He is a nice shade of chestnut, has a dash of white in his mane and tail, white fetlocks and a white blaze on his forehead. In showing him Mayor Walker will be making his début in horse show competition. Other prominent public figures in the show include Colonel Theodore Roosevelt, who will judge in the military classes.

Horses from all over the East, Middle West and South will be shown, winners of numerous prizes being numbered among the entries. Prominent among the exhibitors will be Mr. and Mrs. Mortimer B. Fuller of Scranton, Pa., who are bringin Amber Crest. Amber Crest, a chestnut gelding of fine proportions, has won countless ribbons throughout the East and is a three-time winner of the President's Cup at the Brooklyn show.

Amber Crest won the cup in 1923, 1924 and 1925. Other saddle horses from the Fuller stables will be Forest Echo, Peter Hermit and Kitty Fischer. A polo pony, Bag o' Tricks, is also entered by the Fullers. Mrs. Fuller's three harness ponies, which have been consistent winners, also will be entered. They are Sunrise, Sunbeam and Sunset.

Moreland Has Big Entry.

Two of the more distant, but nevertheless important exhibitors, are Robert E. Moreland of Lexington, Ky., and Rigan McKinney of Wickliffe, Ohio. Moreland will exhibit nine saddle horses, while McKinney will enter two hunters. Michael Devaney of Port Chester will show McKinney's two hunters, Sandy and Swoon, and will also show a horse of his own, Canadian Lada, gray gelding and a jumper.

In the harness classes Miss Jean Browne Scott of Philadelphia, as usual, dominates the entries. She is bringing her famous horses which have won championships in many shows. Probably the most famous is Knight Commander. Newton Victor, Charm and Fairview Leader are the others.

Keen competition is expected to develop in the polo pony classes. Eight teams of three ponies each have been entered in the team class alone. In addition there will be many single entries. The impetus given to polo by the recently concluded national championship tournament of the United States Indoor Polo Association has aroused great interest in these classes. The 101st Cavalry of Brooklyn, which mustered several of the strongest teams in the various classes of the tournament, has entered Miles, Lacy, Handsome Harry and Prefect. These ponies are lightweights.

In the middleweight classes the cavalry will show Vanity Fair and Peanuts, while in the heavyweight classes it will have Nigger and Crinkie. George C. Sherman, President of the Indoor Polo Association, has entered two fine lightweight ponies in Lady Jane and Judy. G. M. Carnochan, who rode in the recent competition, will show Petarde.

John J. Farrell has named Rocking Chair and Red Tape for the lightweight classes. Earle T. Munkenbeck will show Lyra, and J. Walter Kopke will exhibit Gringo and Essex. Big Martin has been entered by Gerard B. Smith, while Car Pflug is showing Papyrus. Warren Sackman, also a prominent polo player, is showing Bandit. Paul Ladin of the Triangle Polo Club has entered three heavyweight ponies, and General Howard S. Borden of the Rumson Polo Club has entered Lord Monmouth.

Veteran Pirie to Ride Jumpers.

General Borden is also showing a fine pair of harness horses. These are Seaton Wendy and Seaton Burlingame. Alfred B. McClay will also show in the harness events.

One of the most interesting exhibitors in the hunting and jumping classes will be Samuel C. Pirie, considered by many the oldest of the Eastern Horse Show exhibitors, who will take his horses over the jumps himself. He has entered Black Dixon, Firefly and Last Text.

Miss Elizabeth Greve has, as usual, made strong entries in the saddle classes. She will show Dainty Frances, a new Kentucky mare, 15.1 hands high; Castle View, formerly called Moonlight, and her trio, Princess Pat, Jack Spratt and Chipmunk. Miss Janet McKay also will show in the saddle classes. She is bringing back to competition Cherokee Princess a chestnut mare that captured nearly a hundred blue ribbons in the show ring previous to 1925. The Little Girl and Caprice are other entries of Miss McKay's.

3 BERMUDA YACHTS EXPECTED IN RACE

Yawls Dainty and Zena Seem Certain Entries and Syndicate Plans to Supply the Third.

LIST NOW IS TWENTY-FIVE

More Probably Will Take Part In Ocean Contest This Year—Other Yachting News.

By SEABURY LAWRENCE.

There probably will be three entries from Bermuda in the Bermuda ocean race, which will start on June 20, off New London, according to information received yesterday by Herbert L. Stone, Chairman of the Committee in charge of entries to the long deep-sea contest. Two yachts from the islands are practically a certainty and it is probable that a third will be chartered here by Bermuda yachtsmen to take part in the race. It is said that a syndicate is now being formed to take over an American boat to try for one of the prizes.

The two Bermuda yachts which are practically certain to start are the yawl Dainty, owned by Alfred Darrell, and the yawl Zena, which is the property of Don Masters Jr., both of which fly the flag of the Royal Bermuda Yacht Club. Dainty is only 37 feet long over all and was the smallest boat to take part in the Bermuda race of 1923, in which she was a winner in her class. Dainty was sailed up from the islands by Captain Darrell to take part in the 1923 contest, in which a record fleet of 22 boats started.

According to mail advices received by Chairman Stone, the committee that will handle the Bermuda end of the race, when the contestants finish off St. David's Head, outside Hamilton, has been appointed. The members are made up by the flag officers and Race Committee of the Royal Bermuda Yacht Club: Commodore T. C. Gosling, Vice Commodore E. H. Walker, Rear Commodore K. F. Trimmingham, E. H. Trim, Owen Darrell, Max Allen and Lieut. Commander G. S. Ridgway, R. N.

Royal Navy to Cooperate.

Because of the large entry already indicated in the race, it is said that much interest exists in the islands over the event. The active cooperation of the officers of the Royal Navy has been promised by Vice Admiral Sir James Ferguson, Commander-in-Chief of the North American and West Indies English Cruiser Squadron. H. M. S. Calcutta, flagship of Sir James Ferguson, and several other vessels of the squadron will be in the harbor at the time of the race and the officers will cooperate with the Royal Bermuda Yacht Club members in the entertainment of the racing yachtsmen.

Yacht racing is said to have had an unprecedented boom in Bermuda during the past season and many races have been held in the harbors of Hamilton and St. George. Many of the Bermuda yachtsmen are sailing small one-design sloops from the plans of Burgess, Swasey & Paine, the Boston marine architects. These are said to be fast sloops, 29 feet long over all, 20 feet on the water-line, and carrying a Bermuda rig with 391 square feet of sail. About a dozen of these yachts are now owned by Bermuda yachtsmen.

Chairman Stone also announced yesterday that he had received an additional local entry to the Bermuda race fleet. This is the ketch Breeze, a new yacht 40 feet long, owned by Captain W. N. Renan, a Gravesend Bay yachtsman. Breeze carries a Marconi rig. She was built for the Duke of Leinster when the latter contemplated a transatlantic race against the late William Nutting, but was never taken over from her builders by the Duke.

Twenty-five Entries Listed.

With the two Bermuda entries and Captain Roman's boat added to the fleet, the list of probable starters in the Bermuda thrash has reached twenty-five and there is every indication that a record fleet will cross the starting line outside New London on June 20. There is also a possibility that the yawl Islander, in which Harry Pidgeon made his famous trip around the world, will be entered in the race to the Onion Patch. Captain Pidgeon's boat is now anchored off the New Rochelle Yacht Club, in Echo Bay.

The Iowa-born navigator recently told Chairman Stone of the Bermuda Race Committee that he expected to have his boat in Long Island Sound next June and if so would be glad to enter the Bermuda race. If Pidgeon starts he may sail the race single-handed and, if so, this ought to furnish a nice test against the boats with large crews. Islander would sail against the yawls Dainty and Zena and any other smaller craft that may be entered.

Prepare R Class Conditions.

The Race Committee of the New York Yacht Club is busy preparing plans for the series of races to be sailed by yachts of the R Class in September for the cup recently donated by the club. This cup is an annual trophy to be raced for by the class which has done the most to promote the sport of yacht racing during the preceding year.

The New York Yacht Club series for the R boats ought to be very keenly contested, as it will draw not only the crack boats of the Long Island Sound fleet but probably several of the Marblehead R Class. Yankee, Gypsy, Dandelion and other Eastern Yacht Club fliers are possibilities for the special series which will be decided in three races, starting probably on Sept. 14. The conditions for the series will be in the hands of the yacht clubs concerned probably within the next week.

One of the first yachts to be tried out under sail on Long Island Sound will be the new ketch Dragoon, which is the property of Robert N. Bavier of the New Rochelle Yacht Club and which was brought down from the builder's yard, in Nova Scotia, several weeks ago. The Dragoon is now at the B. F. Wood Yard, City Island, and has been fitted with her Marconi racing rig. She may be tried out today if the weather is right.

Dragoon has been entered in the Bermuda Ocean Race and her owner hopes she will make good in the long contest. Captain Bavier won two of the Bermuda races with his famous yawl, Memory, which was sold several months ago.

CHAMPION REISELT TO DISPLAY SKILL

New Three-Cushion Titleholder to Open Match Against Wakefield Here Tomorrow.

Ten years of persistent effort finally has brought its reward to Otto Reiselt of Philadelphia. Over that long stretch he has been a regular contender for the world's three-cushion championship, but it was not until this season that he was able to win the much-sought crown. For the past five years he regularly has rated among the Big Four, sharing that honor with Bob Cannefax, Johnny Layton and Tiff Denton. Previously he was in the running along with such stars as Augie Kieckhefer, Charles McCort, Pierre Maupome, Charley Ellis, Gus Copulos and others.

Reiselt will make his first metropolitan appearance of the season when he meets Harry Wakefield, Pacific Coast champion, who formerly represented Cleveland in the three-cushion league, in a special 600-point match which will open at the Strand Academy tomorrow afternoon. The match will be played in twelve blocks each of fifty points. Reiselt already has announced that he plans to keep active all season and that he is ready to meet all comers in a series of matches. The Wakefield engagement will be the first of these series of tests.

Alfredo De Oro, former champion, satisfied that his game is sound, hopes to have a chance to meet Reiselt during his metropolitan stay. Just at a time when Willie Hoppe was testing his three-cushion game preparatory to his first meeting against Cannefax he arranged a special match with De Oro and while he was the victor Hoppe admitted later that he learned much about three-cushions as a result of that match.

GREENLEAF DEFEATED IN HANDICAP MATCH

Scores 1,408 to 1,250 for Rudolph in 12 Blocks, but Falls 92 Short of His Goal.

Erwin Rudolph defeated Ralph Greenleaf, former world's pocket billiard champion, in their handicap match which was concluded at Dwyer's Broadway Academy last night. Rudolph, who was playing for 1,250 points against 1,500 for Greenleaf, completed his required number in the final block when Greenleaf had reached 1,408.

Rudolph virtually clinched the match in yesterday afternoon's block when he outscored the former champion, 116 to 65, in eleven innings. Rudolph had a high run of 40 in this block, against one of 23 for Greenleaf.

Greenleaf outscored his opponent in the night block, 123 to 123, in 33 innings, but fell 92 points short of overcoming the handicap he had allowed Rudolph. Rudolph had a high run of 37 in this block and Greenleaf one of 36.

It was announced last night that Greenleaf had agreed to meet Andrew St. Jean of Minneapolis in a 1,500-point match which will open at Dwyer's tomorrow afternoon.

LANG DROPS 2 SETS BUT WINS NET TITLE

Takes Last Three From Chapin to Gain North-South Crown at Pinehurst.

MRS. CHAPIN ALSO VICTOR

Beats Miss Bayard in Women's Final, 6-3, 7-5, but Loses to Her in Doubles.

PINEHURST, N. C., April 17.—Jerome Lang of New York, former Columbia star, was crowned new United North and South men's singles tennis champion here today after five hard sets with Alfred H. Chapin Jr. of Springfield, Mass. The score was 3—8, 2—6, 10—8, 6—4, 6—4.

After losing the first two sets the spectators counted the New York star out, but he staged a thrilling comeback. Lang reached the count of point-set eight times, but each time Chapin had enough reserve to get the point and stand the New York player off. On the ninth attempt Lang achieved his victory.

The women's singles resulted in a victory for Mrs. Chapin, the former Charlotte Hosmer of California. Mrs. Chapin conquered Miss Martha Bayard of Short Hills, N. J., 6—3, 7—5, with less difficulty than was expected.

The men's doubles champions are S. Howard Voshell of New York and Chapin, who defeated T. Harada and Raymond B. Bidwell of Boston, 6—0 and 6—1.

Miss Bayard, paired with Miss Penelope Anderson of Richmond, Va., defeated Mrs. Chapin and Mrs. Benjamin F. Briggs of Pelham, at 11—9, 6—4.

BILLY MARTIN WINS THE POINT-TO-POINT

Captures Baltine Grand National 'Chase—Rock Green Suffers Broken Back.

BALTIMORE, April 17 (AP).—Billy Barton, owned by Howard Bruce of Baltimore, and ridden by Albert G. Ober, captured the twenty-fifth annual Grand National Point-to-Point Steeplechase race to day over a three-mile course on the Green Spring Valley estate of Captain Isaac E. Merson.

Wilson K. Levering's Royal Duck, with Lieutenant Victor P. Noyes astride, finished second, closely followed by Pepi, from the stable of Foxhall P. Keene of New York.

A crowd of 7,500 saw the record field of twenty jumpers go to the post. Billy Barton went to the front at the drop of the flag and was never headed. The race was one of the fastest in the memory of Maryland followers, the winner's time being 6:31.

Only one bad spill marred the event. Coming into the fourth fence Rock Creek, owned by Benjamin Leslie Behr of Chicago, fell and broke his back. Albert Burrage Jr. of Boston, who had the mount, suffered severe bruises.

LOAYZA SCORES KNOCKOUT.

The victor weighed 135 and Darcey 137.

In the semi-final bout, also of six rounds, Phil Richards of England outpointed Matty Mario of Staten Island. Richards weighed 136 and Mario two pounds more. In other six-round encounters Lew Presti, 123, Long Island City, defeated Anthony Russo, 122, South Brooklyn; Tommy Hamba, 130, Pittsburgh, defeated Lew Millmen, 149½, east side, and Ralph Cohen, 133, Williamsburg, defeated Willie Piersen, 135, east side.

Sanchez and Albano to Meet.

Vincent Sanchez and Frankie Albano will be rivals in a bout scheduled for twelve rounds at the 102d Medical Regiment Armory Thursday night as the first of the featherweight elimination matches to determine the National Guard champion. Bobby Murray and Joe Curry are to clash in the eight-round semi-final.

Road Race on Today's Card.

The second of the series of practice road races in preparation for The Graphic's modified marathon race scheduled for May 1 will be run this afternoon over a six-mile course starting from the Glencoe A. C. at 154th Street and Seventh Avenue.

M'WATTERS WINS MASON-DIXON TITLE

Wins Golf Final Match at White Sulphur From Blair With Card of 81.

WHITE SULPHUR SPRINGS, W. Va., April 17.—Tom McWatters of Newark won the Mason and Dixon championship here today when he defeated J. I. Blair of Tuxedo Park in the final round on the twentieth hole of the No. 1 course.

McWatters was 5 up with only six holes left when Blair started a great comeback. A lucky half at the twelfth started him off. He took the thirteenth when McWatters missed a shot, and later missed a putt of only a foot. Blair holed a forty-foot putt at the fourteenth. On the home hole Blair laid a No. 1 iron shot dead to the mark for a deuce.

PINEHURST, N. C., April 17.—C. Ross Somerville of London, Ontario, won the mid-April golf tournament here today when he defeated R. A. Stranahan of Toledo by the narrow margin of one up in the eighteen-hole final on the championship course.

Somerville got off to a good start by winning the first two when the Toledo golfer was trapped. These were the only holes he won going out, however. Stranahan won the third and the fifth, and became one up when he added the seventh with a 3.

Coming in, Somerville picked up two in succession at the twelfth and thirteenth, only to toss them away at the next two. A birdie 4 at the long sixteenth evened the match. They halved the short seventeenth with threes. At the eighteenth Somerville's four was good for a win.

Walker Is Among Notables to Greet the Hakoah Soccer Team on Arrival Here

HAKOAH TEAM HERE, GREETED BY MAYOR

All-Jewish Organization, Champions of Austria, to Play Best Elevens of U. S.

PRACTICE GAMES THIS WEEK

Visiting Club to Meet Brooklyn Wanderers Tuesday and N. Y. U. on Wednesday.

Eighteen players, members of the soccer team of the Hakoah Sports Club of Vienna, an all-Jewish organization, arrived in New York yesterday morning on the Berengaria. They marched down Broadway to City Hall shortly after debarking and were officially welcomed to the city by Mayor Walker. The Mayor donned one of their Apache caps and was photographed with the squad of players. Congressman Emanuel Celler of Brooklyn presented the men to the Mayor.

After the welcoming at City Hall, the squad went to the Crescent Athletic Club's Summer home in Bay Ridge in motors. They will make the Crescent home their headquarters while in New York and will hold several practice skirmishes on their host's field.

The itinerary of the tourists will be a hard one, as they are anxious to meet the strongest elevens available in Chicago, Newark, Philadelphia, St. Louis, Providence and Boston. Their first encounter will be with an all-star team picked from the New York State Association at the Polo Grounds next Sunday. It is expected that the largest crowd ever to see a soccer game in this country will turn out for that contest.

Players in Top Form.

Captain Alexander (Nemes) Neufeld was the first to come down the gangplank, and he was followed by Alexander Fabian, Max Scheur, Maximilian Gold, Meriz Haeusler, Albert Guttman, Ernee Schwarz, Erwin Pollak, Jakob Wegner, Alois Hess, Max Gruenwald, Siegfried Wertmann, Theodor Wegner, Heinrich Schoenfeld, Leo Druckner, Josef Gruenfeld, Alfred Krauss and Josef Eisenhefer. Dr. Valentin Rosenfeld, trainer and coach, had with him Dr. Eugen Felix and Siegfried Vogelfaenger. Dr. Koerner, President of the Hakoah Club, has been in New York several weeks and was on the pier to greet the men.

Two practice games are listed for this week, and these should suffice to keep the men in the pink of condition. In the first contest, on Tuesday, the invaders will meet the fast Brooklyn Wanderers of the American League at Hawthorne Field, and on Wednesday they will meet the New York University eleven at Jasper Oval, 137th Street and Amsterdam Avenue.

Club Has 5,000 Members.

The arrival of the Hakoah stars marks a new milestone in the advancement of soccer and is equally as significant in the realm of Jewish endeavor. Years ago a British soccer team, known as the Pilgrims, invaded the United States. This organization was the first foreign eleven of high class ability to enter the country and the expense entailed in bringing the players here, approximately $10,000, checked further efforts along this line as expenses were barely met. It will cost several times that sum to finance the Hakoah players but conditions now are so different that followers of the sport are confident the Vienna eleven will turn in a handsome profit at the termination of the tour.

Following the war, athletic conditions in Vienna were in a state of chaos. Then it was that leaders among the Jews came to the conclusion that the athletic development of the race should receive serious consideration, so the formation of the Hakoah Club gradually took shape. Membership was restricted to Jews and from a feeble beginning, the club grew until now it has more than 5,000 members and has served as an inspiration to Jews all over Europe where several clubs similar to Hakoah have become realities.

Senator Straus Welcomes Team.

In welcoming the Hakoah team, State Senator Nathan Straus Jr. issued the following statement:

"It is an unusual pleasure and privilege to welcome the Hakoah athletes who have arrived in America to compete with representative American teams.

"Time, money and energy have been poured into Europe by generous Americans in order to re-establish the Jews in those lands on an economic basis and to give them the possibility of happy lives. All of these efforts have been necessary and useful. However, on a par with the need for spiritual development and economic independence, is the need for the development of physical vigor, without which the Jew can not apply himself to industry and to agriculture on a basis of equality with the other peoples of Europe.

"The finest element of the Hakoah program is the effort to raise the physical standard of the European Jew, who, in his effort to obtain high mental development, has neglected his physical welfare. Hakoah is destroying the age-old apathy toward physical strength and prowess. It has developed a keen interest in the health of the new generation.

"The problem with which Hakoah deals is a universal problem. Given greater possibilities for health, the Jew will be able to increase his contribution to the civilized world."

Officials announced the line-ups for next Sunday's game shortly after the Hakoah men arrived here. Both sides may make changes, but the coaches said none were contemplated at present and they expected their teams to take the field in the following positions:

Record Police Force to Patrol Boston Marathon Tomorrow

BOSTON, April 17 (AP).—A total of 106 runners is entered today for the twenty-ninth annual American Marathon Monday. But, of them all, two stand pre-eminent—Albin Stenroos of Finland, Olympic Marathon king, and Clarence De Mar, four times winner of the B. A. A.'s yearly classic. Stenroos today plans to run twelve miles from Hopkinton, where the marathon starts. He says he is in top condition, and De Mar also claims he has never been in finer fettle. In anticipation of the largest crowd that has ever witnessed the long grind, Boston police have been ordered out in record force and 348 men from the City Department, besides large squads from the various towns through which the 26 miles and 385 yards of the marathon lie, will be on duty.

BETHLEHEM WINS; POLICE ARE CALLED

Disperse 4,000 Who Chase the Referee After He Gives Decision That Beats Phils, 1-0.

ESCAPES OVER THE FENCE

Arbiter Runs Into Near-By House for Protection as League Soccer Game in Philadelphia Ends.

PHILADELPHIA, April 17.—Bethlehem defeated Philadelphia in a bitterly contested American League game today by 1 to 0, and the 4,000 fans became so angered over a decision by Referee George Young that they chased him from the field.

The Philadelphians played a fast and clever game from the start, and so keenly fought was the contest that neither team could score until near the end of the first half, when Goldie scored on a penalty.

In the second half, and with only five minutes to play, Manson of the Phillies booted one under the crossbar, but the goal keeper threw the ball over the top of the net. It looked like a clear goal, and when Referee Young refused to allow the point the trouble started. Young gave a corner kick instead of a goal, and when this was missed the game ended.

The crowd waited for the referee after the game was over and when he appeared they started after him. The referee saw them coming and taking a hasty look started to run, vaulting a high fence and running into a near-by house for protection. By this time the police arrived and the crowd was dispersed.

STUYVESANT WINS CLOSE SWIM MEET

Forces George Washington Out of Three-Cornered P. S. A. L. Deadlock, 33-28.

STILL TIED WITH ERASMUS

Two Lead With Unbroken Strings of Four Victories—Four Tourney Records Are Lowered.

The three-cornered deadlock for the lead in the Public Schools Athletic League's high schools first term indoor swimming championship tournament was changed to a two-cornered tie yesterday morning in the fourth series of dual meets held in the pool of City College when the lads of Stuyvesant High School defeated George Washington H. S. in one of the most keenly contested meets of the tournament to date, 33 to 28. The victory gave Stuyvesant an unbroken string of four triumphs. George Washington dropped from the tie for first into a three-cornered deadlock with Townsend Harris Hall H. S. and James Monroe H. S. for third.

The swimmers of Erasmus Hall H. S. are tied with Stuyvesant for the lead. Erasmus beat Boys' High, 51 to 10.

The Stuyvesant-George Washington clash also was one of the greatest in point of record performances. Four tournament records were shattered yesterday and one was equaled, and with one exception these were confined to this meet.

The exception came in the 50-yard swim, a mark which was twice surpassed. Brick, Erasmus Hall, returned the first record performance, winning the 50-yard event in 29 3-5 seconds, one-fifth of a second faster than the old record. Then in the Stuyvesant-George Washington meet Dreyfus of George Washington beat Brick's mark, winning in 29 1-5 seconds.

Goodman of Stuyvesant won the 220-yard swim in 3:13 4-5, as against the old mark of 3:26. In the 220-yard relay Stuyvesant's team of Vayanos, Udowitz, Frene and Kides swam in 2:12 3-5, beating the old mark of 2:16 3-5. The fancy diving competition saw the season's mark beaten three times by Lesch of Stuyvesant, who won with 49 points, and by Nigen and Tannenbaum of George Washington, who tied with 47 points each. NAVY ELEVEN CHECKS THE MARYLAND ATTACK

Football Team Shows More Power in Practice Game—Osburn Put in Backfield.

Special to The New York Times.

ANNAPOLIS, Md., April 17.—Enough good football was exhibited in the practice game here this afternoon between the Naval Academy and the University of Maryland to produce real enthusiasm from the crowd. The game differed little from a regular contest, except that the teams were not permitted to carry the ball beyond the 20-yard line. Otherwise it conformed to a normal game, lasting four regular 15-minute periods, the coaches being excluded from the playing field. The regular number of downs also was observed.

Distinct improvement in both teams over the practice game played here last Saturday was noted, particularly as to the offense of the Navy team. There was much more power, speed and sureness in the Navy backfield than on last Saturday. A move of much importance was the shifting of Osburn, for two years varsity centre, to the backfield, Du Borg going to the middle of the line. For several seasons the Navy has needed a big, powerful man in the backfield, and it appears that he has been found in Osburn, who weighs 190.

MORRIS HIGH WINS IN P. S. A. L. SHOOT

Team's Total of 994 Points Out of 1,200 Takes First Half of Trophy Match.

STUYVESANT H. S. SECOND

Scores 967 Points, With Evander Childs Third—Davidowitz and Smith Star.

A shattering of the season's scholastic shooting records marked the resumption of competition in the Public Schools Athletic League's high schools' rifle shooting tournament yesterday morning in the indoor ranges at Brooklyn Athletic Field. The occasion was the first half of the New York State Rifle Association Trophy match, for which sixteen teams have nominated entries.

The young marksmen of Morris High School, returning their most impressive exhibition of the series, earned the distinction of leading eight rival teams in the first half of the shoot with a score of 994 points out of a possible 1,200.

Leaders of two rival teams enjoyed the distinction of shattering the season's marks. Captain Davidowitz of the Thomas Jefferson H. S. firing squad eclipsed the season's best mark for shooting from the standing position when he accounted for 90 points out of a possible 100, two in excess of the old mark of 88 points.

In aggregate score for prone and standing shooting, the card of Captain Clifford Smith of Evander Childs H. S. stood supreme. He scored 186 points, two in excess of the season's best previous mark.

A capacity crowd of 500 persons saw the race. The Boys' Club team of New York finished third. The Winged Foot four of Vollmer, Ball, Henriette and Cann, finished in 1:21.

Ball later won the 120-yard medley swimming race in 1:46, distancing Harold Florence of the Boys' Club, by a few feet. A. Goll of the New York A. C. was third in this event.

In a water polo game, the New York Athletic Club team defeated the Montclair Athletic Club, 30 to 13. State Senator Higgins refereed the game. Joe Ruddy, veteran New York A. C. star, and his son scored 25 of the 30 Winged Foot points. Vollmer scored the other five.

MORE HONORS GAINED BY JOCHIM, GYMNAST

Individual Work of Met. Champion Enabled Swiss Verein to Win Trophy.

While the keen contest between the Swiss Turn Verein and the New York Turn Verein for premier honors at the recent metropolitan gymnastic championship was of great interest to many spectators, the performances of Al Jochim, metropolitan senior all-around champion and holder of other titles, was considered by others the feature of the competition. Jochim, one of the mainstays of the American Olympic team in 1924, is a member of the Swiss Turn Verein, and his individual brilliance enabled his club to carry off the point trophy with a total of 24 points. The New York Turn Verein was second with 21 points.

Jochim captured three events and finished second in three others. He won the free calisthenics event with comparative ease, and also captured the flying rings event. On the horizontal bar, however, he had to struggle valiantly to win. Walter E. Meyer of the New York Turn Verein was runner-up to Jochim for the all-around championship honors.

PUBLIC SCHOOL 89 WINS SWIM TITLE

Shatters Two Records and Wins Two Titles in Elementary Championships at C. C. N. Y.

BROOKLYN NO. 9 IS SECOND

Defending Titlists Get 14 Points, 6 Behind Leaders—Bronx 12 and 70 Tie for Third Place.

Youthful swimmers of Public School 89, Brooklyn, monopolized the honors yesterday afternoon in the annual elementary schools indoor swimming championships conducted under the auspices of the Public Schools Athletic League in the City College pool. Rolling up 20 points, the Brooklyn youngsters carried off the team championship and in addition made two of three record performances furnished in the course of the meet.

In scoring their team triumph the "89" boys annexed two of the five titles decided. With their twenty tallies the victorious squad outscored the youngsters of Public School 9, Brooklyn, winners of the title in 1924 and last year, by six tallies. Youngsters of Public School 70, Bronx, and Public School 12, Bronx, were deadlocked for third position each with 5 tallies, and the boys of Public School 166 and Public School 184, leading the Manhattan contingent, tied for fifth position, each with 4.

The "89" lads who returned record performance were McCormick, who won the 25-yard swim in 15 2-5 seconds, displacing Rothman's old mark of 16 seconds, and the school's relay quartet, composed of Quinn, Wilkins, Piddington and Lindley. This fast-swimming four annexed the 100-yard relay swim title in 1:01, equalling the record made by Public School 9.

A third Public School A. L. record went by the boards in the 100-yard swim, in which Engle of Public School 12, Bronx, emerged triumphant in 1:13 4-5, one and one-fifth seconds faster than the old mark of 1:15, held by Werner of Public School 9, Brooklyn.

Engle's victory was the most impressive scored in the program of five events which produced unusually keen and exciting competition. The Bronx lad, getting off to a good start, led his rivals throughout and at the finish was the winner by about four yards over Meyer of Public School 9, Brooklyn.

One of the closest finishes of the day was furnished in the 50-yard swim which ended with the three leaders less than a yard apart. The summaries:

MISS O'NEIL IS A WINNER

Miss Kathleen O'Neil of the Women's Swimming Association, Donald Warner of the Brooklyn Central Y. M. C. A., and his clubmate, Kurt Ramsdorf, won metropolitan A. A. U. junior aquatic championships in the seventy-five-foot pool at the Bronx Union Y. M. C. A. last night.

Miss O'Neil won the 220-yard free style title, Warner the 500-yard swim and Ramsdorf the fancy diving fixture.

Miss Ethel Ursprung, another W. S. A. girl, gave Miss O'Neil a neck-and-neck battle up to 150 yards, but after that Miss O'Neil slowly drew away and finished with a four-yard lead in 3:14. Miss Viola King defeated her clubmates, Miss Irene Wallen and Miss Elizabeth De Muth, for third place.

Those who qualified for the men's 500-yard title race besides Warner were Fayette Smith of the Brooklyn Y. M. C. A., 13-year-old Raymond Ruddy of the New York A. C. and Fred Wood of the Boys' Club.

Smith set the pace for a while in the final, but Warner then went to the front. He won in 6:24, twenty-five and forty yards respectively ahead of Smith and Ruddy.

NEW OPPORTUNITIES FOR JERSEY CITY

Extensive Rail and Water Facilities Attracting Industrial Concerns.

CITY IS MAKING NEW LAND

Filling Square Mile Area on Newark Bay—Benefits of Vehicular Tunnel.

Surveys made by the Russell Sage Foundation indicate that metropolitan New Jersey will have a population of more than 6,000,000 persons by 1950. A careful analysis by those in a position to render intelligent opinions upon the subject has resulted, states the Jersey City Chamber of Commerce, in a far-seeing policy of making adequate provision for the influx of residents, retail stores and manufacturing enterprises seeking locations in Jersey City.

The downtown portion is less than five minutes to Broadway and Cortlandt Street, New York City, by the Hudson tubes and nineteen minutes to Broadway and Thirty-third Street, bringing the metropolitan financial retail and theatre districts closer to Jersey City than to many parts of Manhattan, Bronx or Brooklyn.

Now Building Bulkheads.

The municipal authorities are constructing bulkheads on the west waterfront, to be filled by the dredging of Newark Bay so as to add a territory nearly a square mile in area adapted to industrial development. It will have both rail and water facilities.

The Chamber of Commerce also points out the tremendous opportunities offered by development of the meadows property immediately adjacent to the western part of the city.

The Western Electric Company is completing a plant which will employ 30,000 persons, while other neighboring plants, including those of the Ford, Public Service, Seaboard and By-Products Coke concerns will draw literally millions of residents to this vicinity.

The opening of the vehicular tunnel between Jersey City and Manhattan is expected to revolutionize the entire traffic situation in the metropolitan district.

Much of the freight now lightered across the river will be diverted to direct truck store delivery, thus lessening the cost and expediting delivery in the entire district.

Tunnel Opening a Boon.

"The opening of the tunnel presages an era of industrial, retail and residential development in Jersey City, the magnitude of which is difficult to comprehend," says Edwin B. Lord, manager of the Commerce Chamber. "Jersey City, the terminus of nine trunk railroads, having an easy access to the raw material not only of the nation at large by rail but of the entire world by water, occupies a strategic position that manufacturers and retailers will be quick to realize and take advantage of. When to this are added the opportunities located on its east and west waterfronts it is not surprising that far-sighted individuals are very optimistic about the future of New Jersey's metropolis.

"There are many opportunities for the location of factories and retail stores, and the Jersey City Chamber of Commerce has established a service to assist business men who desire to investigate the opportunities and available sites."

Fifty Homes for Union, N. J.

A development of approximately thirty-eight acres has been purchased by Peter Ernst, Union, through the office of the New Suburban Development Company of Union, N. J., of which L. J. Zehnbauer is Secretary. There will be fifty houses under construction within a month. This development will be known as Stuyvesant Park.

New Lyndhurst Development.

H. R. Bogle, realtor of Lyndhurst, will shortly open a new home community near the heart of the town of Lyndhurst, N. J., to be known as Southwest Gardens.

JERSEY HOME AREAS TO BE DEVELOPED

William Kennelly, Auctioneer, Sees Improvement From Proposed Tunnels and Bridges.

Important bridge and tunnel improvements now under way or projected will remove the last barriers to the full development of many admirable New Jersey residential sections which have so sorely needed better and quicker transit communication with New York City, according to William Kennelly, who said:

"The rugged and picturesque country along the westerly banks of the Hudson and running inland have already begun to feel the effects of the tremendously important improvements that have been authorized and it is concededly but a matter of time when great stretches of this territory will be transformed into thriving residential communities.

"People in Manhattan are just as interested in the potentialities of this area as are the residents of New Jersey, because these newly available lands will present unusual opportunities to dwellers in congested city districts to acquire home sites considerably lower in price than those in other suburban areas within the same riding distance.

"New Jersey has of course enjoyed excellent transit facilities, including railroads, trolleys and buses, but the route from New York to many towns has been circuitous instead of direct, and this factor may have some influence.

"New Jersey real estate men are unanimous in proclaiming not only the residential advantages of their communities but also the money-making possibilities in the light of the new developments.

"While Bergen County is experiencing the first effects of the buying movement the adjacent interior counties are also beginning to feel its influence, and we find rising values and increased buying in many other districts.

"An interesting test of the demand for properties in the outer area of benefit by the projected bridge improvements will be provided on May 8, when I offer 350 well located lots in Westfield, N. J., with large frontages on the boulevard, one of the principal residential thoroughfares of the town, and on Central Avenue, a concrete highway which links Westfield and Rahway. There has been a good market for holdings in this vicinity and this sale will further reflect public interest. It will incidentally mark my first New Jersey auction sale this season, one of a considerable number which are destined to break up large holdings for the benefit of the small buyer.

"The possibilities of suburban New Jersey are practically unlimited and their proper capitalization depends on those who have the foresight to buy now."

THE "Times Square" of future Newark, N. J., will be centred about Military Park, according to Maurice I. Strunsky, who is erecting the twenty-one-story Military Park Building, which, when completed, will be New Jersey's largest skyscraper.

The floors are 12,000 square feet in area up to the thirteenth story, from which a tower rises, providing total floor areas of 4,000 square feet, with its peak twenty-one stories above Park Place.

The architectural design of the building gives a striking mass effect. The decorative motive has been taken from the tradition of Military Park. Statuary slabs, with two soldiers carved in relief and separated by a shield surmounted with cannon balls, form the panel under each window in the interesting façade.

The military theme of the architecture will be carried through the building.

The owners and builders are the Military Park Construction Corporation, of which M. I. Strunsky is President and Louis Cohen Treasurer. Polhemus & Coffin of New York are the architects.

Backing his assertion that Military Park and its surrounding streets would be the "Times Square" of Newark, Mr. Strunsky pointed out that with the new 300-room unit for the Hotel Robert Treat to be erected on the site of the Essex Club, with the club's new five-story home, the Beacon Theatre, the Public Service Terminal, the proposed sports arena and hotel on the Centre Market plaza site, the L. S. Plaut store and the completion of the final units of the Goerke Company's store, the area about the park would be the centre for thousands of shoppers and business people.

"Loew's State Theatre, Fox's Terminal, all these new structures I have mentioned, to say nothing of the Newark Athletic Club, the Wiss Building and other imposing structures," said Mr. Strunsky, "will give us a square here the equal of anything in the country."

Newark Corner Changes Owners.

The vacant plot located at 194-200 Chancellor Avenue, southwest corner of Maple Avenue, Newark, has been sold in a transaction closed through Louis Schlesinger, Inc. The property was owned by the Hoffman Securities Corporation, of which William Hoffman is President. The purchaser was Max Gorewitz. The plot has a frontage of 100 feet on Chancellor Avenue and 100 feet on Maple Avenue. Extensive improvements of stores and apartments are contemplated.

The Horgan Mansion at Deal, N. J., and Cottages to Be Sold at Auction by Joseph P. Day May 1.

ACTIVE HOME BUILDING IN THE ORANGES

Recent Growth in New Developments Along Substantial Lines.

Among the prominent new developments now going on in the Oranges and their environs are Melmore Gardens, on Prospect Street near Park Avenue, being developed by the Realty Security Company.

A new street going through the property is nearing completion and lots are being sold to individuals for home sites. The new Melmore Gardens cooperative apartments will be located there.

In Orange one of the finest developments in Essex County is now practically completed by the Seven Oaks Development Company, three new avenues having been opened up. This development is situated between Berkley Avenue, Center Street and Tremont Avenue.

In West Orange, the Pennebank-Dodd Company of Newark has acquired a tract of sixty-one acres bounded by Fairview Avenue, Edgewood Avenue, Highland Boulevard and St. Cloud Avenue.

The property has an attractive setting along the mountain ridge. Another development of importance along the ridge is the Dane property at Edgewood Avenue and Northfield Road, which is being plotted out in 500-foot lots, 100 lots in the tract. There is talk of developing this property with brick one-family houses to sell at reasonable prices.

In South Orange a number of developments of importance are under way on Wyoming Avenue, opposite Highland Road. Beach Spring Hill, between Ridgewood Road and Wyoming avenue is declared to compare favorably with anything in Westchester or the widely known Long Island developments.

BIG NEWARK LEASE.

Paper Concern Also Takes Option to Purchase Property.

The Lewmar Paper Company, at 72 Clinton Street, Newark, has just leased, through Feist & Feist, the lower portion of the building at 72-76 Mechanic Street, between Lawrence and Mulberry Streets, for a term of years.

The lease was made for Leopold Meyer, owner of the building and former head of the American Undergarment Company. The Lewmar Paper Company, in its new quarters, will occupy space approximating 12,000 square feet. The lease carries with it an option to purchase the property.

$100,000 APPROPRIATED FOR NEW JERSEY BRIDGE

New Structure Will Connect Staten Island With Bayonne, N. J.

Governor Smith has signed the bill, under the terms of which New York will match New Jersey's $50,000, already authorized, to finance the cost of borings, soundings and surveys necessary to get the work under way to construct the Bayonne-Staten Island bridge.

The bridge, like the ones over the Arthur Kill and the proposed suspendous span across the Hudson River from Fort Lee to Fort Washington, will be constructed by the Port Authority.

All of these bridges will be paid for by the collection of tolls.

The proposed new bridge will add an important link to a system of bridges and highways, greatly improving transportation facilities in the metropolitan area.

The rapid development of the bridge and tunnel idea in this area is amazing, when it is considered that five great proposals of the kind have been adopted and are being planned or carried out.

JERSEY AUCTION SALES INVOLVE OLD HOLDINGS

The Horgan Mansion and Pierce Estates to Be Sold by J. P. Day.

"If public improvements and widespread public interest mean anything, then the current year should be an unusually busy one in real estate circles in New Jersey," said Joseph P. Day, discussing conditions yesterday.

"I base this prediction on the activity that should follow the completion of the Hudson River Vehicular Tunnel from Canal Street, Manhattan, to Jersey City, and on the progress made in the proposal to build a Hudson River bridge from Washington Heights, Manhattan, to Fort Lee, N. J.; also on the important improvements proposed to be made in the service of the various railroads that feed the southern, central and northern sections of New Jersey.

"The effect of these improvements has been strongly reflected in the volume of real estate trading recorded recently in the various cities, towns and counties of the State; also in the many substantial profits reported by those who had the foresight to buy at pre-boom prices, while the plans for these improvements were being perfected or else while the improvement itself was in course of construction.

"Now, if ever, is the time to buy real estate in New Jersey and to profit from the higher values of the future. We all know what the East River bridges have done for Brooklyn and Queens and what the Harlem River bridges have meant to the Bronx.

"We should be able to visualize the future effect of bridges to New Jersey from Manhattan and Staten Island. The man who can correctly visualize the effect of these bridges and the great movement of population that will follow their construction, is the man who will profit to the greatest extent from the exercise of the foresight that has been given to him."

Two New Jersey sales are scheduled to be held by Mr. Day, at Bound Brook, N. J., on Saturday, April 24, and at Deal Beach, on Saturday, May 1.

The first sale involves the Pierce Estate holdings at East Bound Brook, adjoining Bound Brook, N. J. It will be held in the Warehouse Building, on Main Street, near Raritan Avenue, East Bound Brook, and included in it are 325 business and residential lots, twenty-five one and two-family dwellings and a business block containing stores and a public garage.

The Deal Beach sale involves not only the disposal of the popular and widely-known Deal Inn (equipped and ready for business), located directly on the main highway, and at the Deal Station, but also the Horgan mansion, designed by Stanford White, architect, for Mr. Horgan, who was a member of the firm of Horgan & Slattery, architects, formerly prominent in the construction of apartment houses and business buildings in Manhattan.

There are also to be sold nineteen furnished dwellings that also are located in the immediate vicinity of the station.

UNION COUNTY PARK.

Property Values Move Upward in Anticipation of Improvement.

Residents and property owners of Union, N. J., are looking forward eagerly to the completion of the improvement decided upon for the township by the Union County Park Commission.

Land necessary for a parkway bordering the west branch of the Elizabeth River from Salem dam to the other end of the municipality is being rapidly acquired, and the good effects of a county park are being felt.

New real estate developments are being planned on the basis of the park improvement. Property values are already increasing.

Near Salem dam a street has been laid out, on a map, entitled Riverside Drive, and owners are holding their lots for even better prices, which they are certain are bound to result.

The Rahway River and the west branch of the Elizabeth River have been considered by the Park Commission for some time as excellent locations for a part of the park system, but lack of funds made it impossible to proceed.

Recently, after numerous meetings with the Township Committee and residents who own land bordering the rivers, it was found that a number of these owners were willing to cooperate to the extent of donating property.

Besides the banks of the two rivers, this development will include about fifteen acres in the northwest part of the township. All of this property is low, swampy land, suited admirably to park purposes, but to little else.

FUTURE PROGRESS IN BERGEN COUNTY

New Hudson River Bridge Will Give Quick Access to Many Home Centres.

GOOD HIGHWAY FACILITIES

Mrs. Mulligan Outlines Possibilities of Growth in Near-by Jersey Section.

It is difficult to estimate the future of Bergen County when the completion of the great Hudson River bridge offers easy transportation facilities to the scores of pleasant home centres in that section of New Jersey, according to Agnes E. Murphy Mulligan, whose name was associated with many Bronx realty transactions several years ago. Mrs. Mulligan has transferred her real estate activities to Palisade, N. J., and predicts a great future for the locality in succeeding years.

"It is difficult to estimate the future of the region," she says. "The most optimistic predictions would be likely to fall far short of the mark, as did the ideas of New Yorkers about values of the Bronx in the '80s, then an outlying northern district.

"No part of the metropolitan district now offers such good opportunities for real estate investment as does Bergen County.

"Bergen County, through the passage of the necessary legislation by New York and New Jersey, has been made the plaza for the proposed Hudson River Bridge, the biggest suspension structure ever planned.

Bergen County's Advantage.

"The advantages which Bergen County will enjoy when the $50,000,000 bridge is finished surpass anything of a like nature in the lines of real estate on the Atlantic coast.

"Over the new bridge the crowded population of New York will stream to Bergen County. The bridge will make it possible to reach any section of the county within twenty minutes' travel from Broadway and Forty-second Street.

"Highways of the most durable type link Bergen County with all parts of New York and New Jersey. These roads give access to the most desirable home centres in the vicinity of New York. From Alpine a new scenic highway is being constructed by the State of New Jersey. It will ultimately connect with Palisade Avenue in the Borough of Fort Lee, and will be a continuous thoroughfare from New York State to the plaza of the Hudson River bridge.

"Leading through Fort Lee from the entrance of the bridge, Palisade Avenue connects directly with the Hudson County Boulevard, which is part of the Lincoln Highway leading to the West. Along this line of traffic are the cities of Newark, Trenton, Philadelphia, the seaports and manufacturing centres of the East and West.

"From the plaza of the Hudson bridge will lead highways, like so many spider webs, to all parts of the State of New Jersey, north, south, east and west. In anticipation of the tremendous traffic which it will be forced to bear, Lemoine Avenue is being extended in Fort Lee so as to connect with Palisade Avenue, making a direct connection with Jersey City, Hoboken and other cities.

Splendid Highway Facilities.

"Wide highways, maintained by the State and County, lead to the west, to the mountains, the lakes and pleasure resorts of upper New York. Anderson Avenue, one of the main traffic arteries to the south, is being improved and will be extended to the north to make another route for motor traffic to and from the bridge.

"Motor buses traverse these highways in all directions. Transportation facilities include trolley lines to all suburban sections.

"Development in Bergen has kept pace with investment possibilities. All towns within a radius of twenty miles from the proposed bridge are adequately supplied with sewers, electricity, gas and water.

"Naturally, prices will soar, as they did in the Bronx. Lots now selling for $300 each will bring $5,000. I had lots for sale in the Bronx at $400 each that are now worth $40,000.

"I saw the Brooklyn Bridge built and know what it did for Brooklyn. I saw what the Queensboro Bridge did for Long Island City and Queens, and what the New York subway did for Washington Heights. I have watched New York spread and grow into the metropolis of the world."

BUSINESS HOUSES COMING TO NEWARK

Great Increase Witnessed in Retail Stores During Recent Years.

IMPROVING STREET SYSTEM

Steady Demand for Well Located Real Estate for Home and Trade Uses.

At its two hundred and fiftieth anniversary Newark adopted as its slogan, "Newark Knows How." Applied to its manufacturing, its civic betterment and to the development of its mercantile trade, that term has proved its worth, says E. J. Maier of that city, and he believes it is particularly applicable to Newark real estate.

"Newark real estate is of such good quality and character," explains Mr. Maier, "that its worth is easily determined, and nothing could be more beneficial than a substantial basis of valuation figured upon the earning capacity of the property. A few weeks ago it was not feasible that in some sections, due to rumored improvements, sales were made at prices which were thought to be far in excess of present or future valuations, and it was feared by some of the conservative operators that the effect of such trading would react to the detriment of the realty market. This proved, however, to be an exaggerated idea.

Retail Store Growth.

"Operators are now looking toward acquiring properties in which permanent improvements may be made, particularly in the retail districts where the demand for store and loft space is steadily increasing, due to the fact that the attention of retail merchants, particularly those operating chain stores throughout the country, have been attracted to Newark.

"In some lines of merchandising the sales in individual stores in Newark have exceeded sales in individual stores in any other city in the country, and while most of the nationally known retailers are represented here, still there are scores of others seeking locations. Owing to the fact that the retail district is limited to a comparatively small area, and that those who have already procured sites have long leases, available space for newcomers must be obtained by the erection of additional buildings and the extension of the present retail district.

"The initial work along these lines has been started and includes the widening of Washington Street and the opening up for trade purposes of the side streets connecting Broad and Washington Streets. With the completion of the new department store buildings on Broad Street, and the new Prudential Building, the shopping public will possibly change its course of travel to an extent which will relieve the Four Corners congestion and will tend to develop the back streets.

Acreage Opportunities.

"There is another phase of real estate development in Newark and vicinity, and that is the attention which is being given in acquiring acreage in the outlying districts, where land may be purchased for a nominal cost for the erection of small homes and still be easily accessible to the bus line systems.

"There is also an increase in population due to the manufacturers who are establishing plants in the vicinity of Newark. This establishment of manufacturers from other cities, particularly from New York, is causing a steady influx of people who are coming to the Jersey hills to make their homes in an atmosphere of health.

"These three factors—the locating of new chain store retailers, the establishment of manufacturers from other cities and the influx of people from New York—are sufficient, without considering Newark's strategic position to insure not only a firm foundation but a constant and steady increase of real estate values from year to year."

Building Wage Scales Show Upward Tendency

An upward tendency in wage scales in the building industry was reported during the last six weeks, but the situation as a whole remained well stabilized.

Increases ranging from five cents to twelve and one-half cents an hour were granted individual crafts in Boston, New York, Cleveland, Dallas, Detroit, Pittsburgh, Portland, Ore., and Washington, D. C. Only one decrease was reported, this being for carpenters in Columbus, Ohio.

In New York the 125,000 mechanics and helpers in the building trades have virtually received assurance of a wage increase. The increases, it is reported, will be $2 a day for plasterers, stone masons and bricklayers, now receiving $12 a day, $1.50 a day for most of the other mechanics and $1 a day for the mechanics' helpers.

Although the wage increase is considered in building trades circles to be an exceedingly generous one, it is being granted only on condition that the unions reform certain abuses which have retarded construction.

NEW JERSEY PROJECT.

Plans Completed for Country Club Section of Cliffwood Beach.

Plans for the creation of a seashore community extending along the coast for six miles at Cliffwood Beach, N. J., have been completed by Morrisey & Walker, Inc., who will open today the Country Club section of Cliffwood Beach, the last link in the chain of developments beginning with Laurence Harbor on the north.

In 1921 the stretch of seashore from the beginning of Laurence Harbor to the end of Cliffwood Beach had no apparent investment value. Two years later Laurence Harbor, a neatly laid-out seashore city, was the million-dollar fulfillment of a mere prediction. In 1924 Cliffwood Beach, some distance to the south, opened and was practically sold out before the close of the 1925 season.

$7,750 Irvington Homes.

Morris Haretnick has purchased a tract at Union and Chancellor Avenues, Irvington, on which he is erecting thirty-five homes. They will consist of six rooms, sun parlor and breakfast room, and will have individual automobile driveways. A standard price of $7,750 has been established.

Montclair Plans.

The Lenox Land Company of Newark, N. J., will file plans in a few days with Building Inspector William H. Senior in Montclair for a $100,000 apartment, with stores on the ground floor, to be erected at 80-86 Church Street.

NEW SYNDICATE BUYS LONG ISLAND ACREAGE

Lirico Estates, Inc.-Long Island Realty Investors Co. Gets 1,000 Acres for Development.

One of the most important Long Island happenings of the year was the organization recently of Lirico Estates, Inc.-Long Island Realty Investors Company, by Frank H. Knighton of Great Neck, L. I., and a group of his friends. Prominently associated with Mr. Knighton in this million-dollar company are Alrick H. Man, Vice President, attorney and President of Kew Gardens Corporation; Ray Palmer, Vice President, consulting engineer, New York; Roger D. Black, Treasurer, Port Washington, L. I.; Ralph W. McPhee, Secretary, Great Neck, L. I.; Walter H. Bond, attorney; J. Barclay Bleecker, President J. Barclay Bleecker, Inc., Flushing realtors; Robert W. Dasey, director Realty Trust, New York; George H. Gifford, President Gifford Construction Company, Jamaica; Samuel Knighton, Frederick H. MacRobert, Wesley M. Oler, President American Ice Company; Wesley M. Oler Jr., Vice President Knickerbocker Ice Company, New York; Jules E. Rosenthal and Edgeworth Smith.

It was announced at the time that the purpose of the company was to engage in the real estate business, and the field selected for its initial operations was Long Island, including its two city boroughs. Through the Ives Company, Southampton, and George D. Grundy, Lirico Estates, Inc., has assembled over a thousand acres of land at Wainscott, L. I. George Grundy will be remembered for his assemblage of that property between East Quogue and Southampton for the Phipps estate. This purchase of Lirico Estates, Inc., includes property both north and south of the Wainscott station. The property extends east approximately two miles as far as the main road between Easthampton and Sag Harbor, with valuable frontage on that thoroughfare. The property extends south to the Montauk Highway and east almost two miles and south to Georgica Pond.

In addition to this large assemblage, eighteen acres have been purchased with frontage on the ocean. The company announces that the plans are now being made for early development of this property into one of the finest eastern Long Island Summer resorts which will include a private bathing club on the ocean and facilities for all sorts of outdoor sports. The Middampton Corporation has been organized for the development of this tract. It is announced that the Ives Company, Southampton, has purchased a 25 per cent. interest in the development company.

GROWING MUNICIPALITIES.

Montclair, Glen Ridge and Bloomfield Building Small Homes.

Three municipalities to the west of Newark, N. J., that are experiencing a healthy building growth, with promise of records being broken during coming months, are Bloomfield, Glen Ridge and Montclair.

With abundant territory available, the three communities are witnessing the spread of transportation facilities with genuine satisfaction, for it means opening of major developments, especially to the north and south, state the building officials.

In Montclair especially is a building boom looked forward to. The Hamilton farm tract, consisting of thirty-one acres and located at Alexander Avenue and Grove Street in the Upper Montclair section, has been purchased by a development company, and it is understood it is making ready for the erection of approximately 100 homes.

There has also been considerable development in recent months on Highland Avenue, Montclair, where twelve dwellings of a high class of architecture are now under course of construction. Building Inspector Senior is optimistic about the future and expects that the greatest activity will be in the Upper Montclair and Highland Avenue sections and the extreme end of the Third Ward, known as the south side.

The total of building valuations for the mountain town in 1925 was $5,741,563.34. This amount, however, was $600,000 less than that in the previous year, when work was begun on several important structures.

The records for the last month show that Montclair stood seventh in building valuations for municipalities in New Jersey.

Berger Estate Sale.

By order of the Manufacturers' Trust Company and Henry M. Goldfogle, executors of the estate of the late Morris Berger, the Jere Johnson Jr. Company, Fred B. Snow, auctioneer, will sell by public auction on Tuesday evening, April 20, at 8 o'clock, in the Brooklyn Real Estate Exchange, 189 Montague Street, nine vacant plots, consisting of about seventy-five lots, in Brooklyn and in East Elmhurst, Borough of Queens. A number of other scattered parcels of realty will be offered at the same time.

Florida Realtors Draft Bill Against Unfilled Promises

Subdividers of property will be required to furnish bonds to cover the cost of any improvements they may promise to purchasers of lots in the tracts they are developing, according to a proposed blue sky law for Florida which is now being drafted by Florida realtors.

The Tampa Real Estate Board has appointed a committee to draft the bill, which will aim at public protection in subdivision development in accordance with the general movement for subdivision standards led by the Home Builders and Subdividers Division of the National Association of Real Estate Boards.

The bill as drafted will come before the Florida Association of Real Estate Boards this Winter. It is expected that it will then go before the various individual boards of the State for ratification before it is introduced in the State Legislature.

OPENS NEWARK BRANCH.

The E. A. White Organization Leases Space on Market Street.

E. A. White Organization, Inc., has leased for a permanent branch in Newark, N. J., the entire ground floor of 21 Market Street, containing about 2,500 square feet and located directly across the street from the Court House.

The new branch is four blocks from Broad Street and seven blocks from the Hudson tube station. The space was leased from J. D. Samuelson, Inc., which has occupied it for several years.

About 100 men will soon be installed in the new branch to sell a new White development in West Caldwell, New Jersey. This development contains 52 acres, divided into 531 lots, and is located just off Bloomfield Road. Westover Boulevard fringes the development and Ravine Avenue cuts through it. The section is already highly developed and contains many homes.

FARM LAND DEVELOPMENT.

Old Landmarks, Make Way for Small Homes at Union, N. J.

More than 200 homes are expected to be erected this Spring in High School Park, containing eighty-three acres, one of the largest developments in the Township of Union, N. J.

The tract is owned by the James Falls Realty Company and Rudolph J. Goerke of Newark, N. J., President of the Goerke Company.

The managing agents are the New Suburb Development Company of Union, of which L. J. Zehnbauer is Secretary. Associate agents are Harold D. Hecht and Harold G. Weber of Irvington.

A total of 191 lots has been sold since the tract was opened four months ago, their sale having realized more than $775,000.

The property is rapidly being graded and water, gas and electricity installed. The lots average 35 by 100 feet, and the homes are being erected at an average cost of $7,800. Among those who have purchased plots are a number of prominent builders and these, according to Mr. Falls, expect to have construction operations under way shortly.

FOREST HILL DEAL.

Crane Family Sells Last Holding in That Newark Area.

The property in the Forest Hill section of Newark at 416-26 Clifton Avenue, between Second Avenue and Abington Street, has been sold by the estate of Cordelia M. Crane to Rocco Tortoriello.

It has a frontage of 135 feet, with a depth of 100 feet, and is the last plot owned by the Crane estate in this district. The Crane family at one time owned several square blocks in that area.

Mr. Tortoriello will improve the plot with one-family dwellings. The sale was made through the Newark office of Feist & Feist.

Claflin Mansion at Auction.

The old Claflin mansion at 55-57-59 Pierrepont Street, between Hicks and Henry streets, Brooklyn Heights, and more than a score of other important Brooklyn properties will be offered for sale at public auction by Realty Associates in the Brooklyn Real Estate Exchange on Thursday evening, April 22.

NEW BUSINESS AREA IN WEST ENGLEWOOD

N. M. Ayers Erecting Moving-Picture Theatre and Stores in Main Square.

PROJECT COSTS $1,000,000

Section Has Shown Remarkable Growth and Development in Past Few Years.

Fifteen years ago a few scattered buildings and wide-open fields were all that met the eye of the passenger alighting at the West Englewood station of the West Shore Railroad. Today there is a residential centre of 700 inhabitants, with homes of varied types and sizes. Credit for this changed condition is accorded to Nelson M. Ayers, who fifteen years ago settled upon the present site of West Englewood for his home and the development of a home centre.

Mr. Ayers is building, at a cost of $1,000,000, a comprehensively planned business section, known as West Englewood Square, to meet the requirements of the town.

Although West Englewood has grown at a rapid rate from a few hundred persons in 1911 to the present population of 7,000, it grew strictly as a high-class residential community. The number and variety of its shops are, therefore, wholly inadequate for a town of its size. Its residents have heretofore been served largely by out-of-town merchants.

Mr. Ayers established restrictions on his property to maintain the prestige of a fine home community. His plans for West Englewood Square are the fruit of careful thought.

West Englewood Square avoids the haphazard conglomeration of unsightly shops which are an eyesore in many towns. The property extends for a third of a mile from the West Englewood Station eastward to Teaneck Road. It is traversed by Market and State Streets, the former terminating in front of the station while the latter ends in a viaduct above the railroad tracks.

A motion-picture theatre is planned for immediate construction. Other structures include an office building and several stores. An interesting architectural feature will be an arcade of shops connecting Market and State Streets halfway between Westfield Avenue and Losier Place.

M. B. Leahy, in charge of sales in that locality, calls attention to the fact that West Englewood is on the direct line of development from the projected Hudson River bridge and is certain to continue its increase in population.

INVESTMENT FIELD IN JERSEY REALTY

Bridges and Vehicular Tunnel Will Aid Development in Many Sections.

To the man with foresight and clear vision New Jersey offers the greatest field for profitable buying of excellent real estate because at the present time the mass of buyers have not learned to fully appreciate the possibilities which New Jersey offers to home-seeker and vacationists, states Howard W. Scott, who has been an active operator and broker in New Jersey real estate for several years.

"The new bridge across the Hudson will open up the northern part of New Jersey in the same manner as the bridges opened up the Bronx and Long Island," says Mr. Scott.

"The vehicular tunnel will open up lines of traffic to the southern parts of New Jersey, as the tubes opened up Brooklyn.

"The electrification of the railroads of New Jersey and the possibilities of direct contact to New York via the bridge and tunnels will give to New Jersey the finest rapid transit service in the country. The installation of a comprehensive bus service, having as its centre Broadway and Forty-second Street, has provided New Jersey residents with a new travel luxury.

"These transit improvements and the completion of the bridges (Staten Island to New Jersey, as well as the Hudson River bridges) have brought to the public attention the nearness of the residential section of New Jersey."

Steinway Estate Auction.

On Saturday evening, May 1, at 7:30 o'clock, the Kennelly organization will sell at auction 129 lots, a part of the former Steinway estate situated in Astoria, L. I., on Berrian Boulevard, directly on Flushing Bay, on Steinway Avenue, the main business thoroughfare, and on Riker Avenue.

SOLID BRICK, one-, two- and three-family houses built by a LIMITED DIVIDEND COMPANY

For the man who wants to give his kids a chance

Real GARDEN HOMES with play space provided

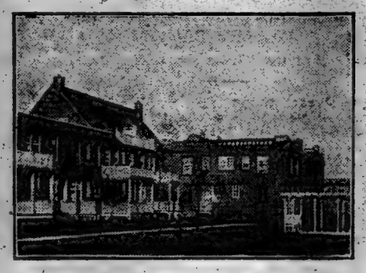
At Sunnyside Gardens there's a private park for the exclusive use of Sunnyside children. You can own one of these two- or three-family thrift homes. Just read how little it costs.



View of spacious central court gardens. Compare this with the usual unsightly garages and fences that occupy most back yards.

A group of children enjoying one of the sand boxes that are provided for every group of houses at Sunnyside Gardens.

EVERY day in New York thousands are asking: "Where can we find homes with real gardens and playgrounds for the children—and low priced?"

At this garden community, just across the Queensboro Bridge, only 15 minutes from Manhattan, a new idea in grouping houses has been developed to meet this demand. In the center of each group of homes is a large central space attractively landscaped. In addition Sunnyside Park, with tennis courts, baseball field, swings and slides, for the exclusive use of Sunnyside residents and their families, is being completed.

An investment as well as a home — With the Sunnyside Payment Plan two- and three-family houses work out to be a real thrift arrangement. They represent an investment as well as a home. For instance, on a two-family house, total cost $12,100, cash payment is only $1210. ALL-IN-ONE monthly payment, after rental of extra apartment, is only $31.67. Compare this with the monthly rent most families in Manhattan pay for a few dingy rooms.

Two new groups now ready — Washington Court and Lincoln Court—two new groups at Sunnyside are just being completed. There is a wide variety of one-, two- and three-family houses now ready for your inspection. Every day more and more of the choice locations are being sold. Come today, or send in coupon below for full descriptive booklet.

The Finest Plan on Park Ave.

WHEN you consider that this building was erected before the war when labor and materials were a fraction of what they are now you will readily understand why we can offer rooms that are larger, ceilings that are higher, and closets that cannot be duplicated elsewhere, at rentals no higher than those asked for other accommodations.

As an added feature the garden around which the building is erected assures you of perfect light and cross ventilation as well as a charming outlook.

SUGGESTED SKETCH OF CORNER OF LIVING ROOM

A living room as you would build it

HAD you planned this living room yourself, you would not have made even a minor change.

The commonplace, standardized, "four-walls-and-some-windows" type of construction has been avoided entirely. In a spacious room, 25 feet long and facing on an avenue 100 feet wide, you find a real wood-burning fireplace to add a note of comfort and coziness. There is a long row of casement windows, with Southern exposure. Notice the additional features in the panel to the left; they are quite unusual and worthy of investigation.

IF it is on Upper Fifth Avenue, it will be considerably more than it is now, as values are rising steadily, and even next year will see a strong appreciation.

Future apartments will be proportionately expensive. Now is the time to buy. The 6, 8 and 9 room apartments and the 11 and 12 room duplex roof garden apartments in 1170 Fifth Avenue offer one of the few remaining opportunities to buy before prices increase.

Further, your children will have a playground in Central Park right at the door, and you a lovely outlook. Investigate these apartments now.

Hudson View Gardens

WHERE could a young couple, or an old couple for that matter, find a more delightful home? What would more certainly give contentment than ownership of a model apartment in a building of mellowed Tudor architecture with outlook upon landscaped gardens and the majestic Hudson?

Purchase of a 3, 4 or 5 room 100% cooperative apartment for servantless housekeeping is made convenient for any eligible family. A moderate initial payment gives possession. Dr. Chas. V. Paterno, who planned and built Hudson View Gardens, will arrange the financing so that terms can be carried over a period of years. Here you will have a sound investment, save half your "rent" and live in a community of home owners. The increasing value of real estate in this section is made even more certain by the coming of the Ft. Washington subway, now under construction, to augment the present transportation facilities.

An exhibition apartment can be viewed at any time. Come and select your home from the choice apartments now available.

SALESMEN.
OF GREATEST IMPORTANCE TO YOU.

1. Supreme Backing. Plus National Publicity and Interest Means Tremendously Greater Success for You. You must have something to sell that is sound and appealing and you must have a backing that is unquestioned and quickly provable. If you are that particular type of salesman we can offer you an opportunity.

2. Our Backing Is High. At the head of this splendid organization is a prominent savings bank President. His firm has been established over ten years, having an enviable reputation in real estate.

3. National Publicity and Interest Is a Great Asset. Our location is of national fame. The general public has heard of it or read of it. You give them the facts substantiated by statements of industrialists, manufacturers, engineers, bankers and well-known business men. There is hardly a newspaper or magazine that has not carried articles relative to it.

4. Something Different in the Way of Sales Assets. We have the highest percentage of results from our methods of creating leads of any which we have tried—and we have tried them all. Some of our successful associates have so many to see they scarcely know which way to turn, outside of their repeat business. The vibration from client to friend is most remarkable. Our commissions on one sale a week will give you an enviable income.

5. A Real Estate Investment of Strongest Appeal. The first mile circle is a new manufacturing centre has the sanction and interest of our great manufacturers. Surely such a location will yield higher returns than in the fifth mile circle of a city already made!

6. Summer Selling Can Go Right On. What are you going to sell this Summer? Be honest with yourself! Can you afford the forced vacation most salesmen face? You should decide right now. National newspaper and magazine articles help you to sell wherever you may be. Our business appeals to all classes of people, but the calibre of sales people we want will cater to the better-thinking class. The resorts, Summer camps and other places can be your "Summer camp" too and your business is your hobby of conversation. Or you can remain in the city or visit your old home town and still get production.

7. You Are Particular—So Are We. Owing to the high type of the successful associates now with us, we must reserve the right of selection. We have openings now for five experienced closers and perchance one or two men without actual sales experience but having the essential characteristics. Only as a means of conserving both your time and ours, we ask you to call Monday afternoon, 2 to 5 P. M., Suite 511-514, 105 West 40th St. If this is not convenient, phone Pennsylvania 8767 for an appointment with Mr. Chase.
